It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

ARRIVAL AT TAHITI.

Matavai Bay at Tahiti, }
August 17, 1829. }

A CLUSTER of low islands and coral reefs lies about midway, in a direct line, between the Washington and Georgian groups, rendering the navigation at that point somewhat intricate and dangerous. From a supposition, that we might be obliged to lie to at night, when in that vicinity, we did not expect to accomplish the passage from Nukuhiva to Tahiti, —a distance of seven hundred miles—in much less time than a week.

In this, however, we were favorably disappointed. The trade wind proved unusually fine; and having made the first of the low islands early on the 14th instant—the second day from Taiohae—we succeeded in running by the whole chain the same evening, and, with an open sea before us, hastened on our course with unchecked speed.

Five of the low islands—the Tikoas, the Palliser, and Elizabeth island—were passed by us within two or three miles of their shores. Elevated a few feet only above the water, scarce in sight at a distance of six and eight miles, and but scantily tufted with groves of the cocoanut and pandanus, they present a strong contrast to the loftiness and magnificent scenery of the groups between which they lie. Though small—some fifteen or twenty miles only in circumference—they are inhabited: but the subsistence they afford is scanty and miserable, consisting almost exclusively, besides fish from the sea, of cocoanuts and the berry of the pandanus.

Happily for the race dwelling upon them, though reduced in their outward circumstances almost to the condition of the brute, the rich blessing of the gospel has reached their desolate shores. Through the influence of native missionaries from Tahiti, they have, within a few years, forsaken their idols and embraced the religion of the cross—have learned to read—possess the scriptures in the Tahitian version—and daily pay their vows to God by hymns and prayer, in neat and humble chapels of their own workmanship.

On Saturday, the 15th instant, at twelve o'clock, we descried Matea, or the Island of Osnaburgh—having run some distance from our course to make it. Perceiving it to be only a lofty, volcanic rock, rising abruptly from the water in a truncated cone—once evidently a burning funnel—we did not approach nearer than twelve or fifteen miles; and bore away for Tahiti, the principal of the Georgian Islands, of which we gained an indistinct view, forty miles distant, at sunset the same evening.

Having been under short sail during the night, we were yesterday morning still far from land; and it was ten o'clock before we were near enough to Point Venus to send a boat on shore, previously to bringing the ship to anchor.

The morning was hazy and unfavorable for the strength of impression which the sublimity and loveliness of the scenery is calculated to make.

In this—particularly in reference to my fellow-voyagers—I felt a disappointment. The image left in my mind, by a first sight of the same section of Tahiti in 1825, when on our voyage from the Sandwich Islands to England, was still so beautiful and so vivid, that I had hoped every circumstance in making the land at this time, would have been equally propitious to a similar effect on those now with me.

Scarce any scene before beheld, had excited an admiration equal to that I then experienced. We had not yet made land, when I retired to rest the night previous; a fine moon, however, enabled us to press on without hazard; and, at the dawn of the day, we were close on the shores of the district of Matavia. It was not yet sunrise, when I went on deck; but the whole heavens were filled with the glow and richness of the near approach of “the king of day,” and sufficient light was already cast upon the island, not only to disclose its general formation, but to present every distinct feature along the coast and in the mountains above, in the fullness of its verdure and beauty. The wild peaks and bare cliffs towering high in the centre of the island were uncovered, and in strong illumination from the sun, still beneath a watery bed. A belt of vaporish cloud hung midway on the purple sides of the mountains beneath, while the rich lowland—a mile and more in width—intervening between their bases and the beach, heavily covered with groves of the bread-fruit, cocoanut, and other luxuriant tropical growth, stood in the purity of the morning, with a refreshing nearness and beauty on the sight.

Spacious chapels of the purest white, with numerous lofty doors and windows—seeming in my eye, after a residence of three years at the Sandwich Islands, in the early stages of improvement there, like so many palaces amidst their palmy groves—were seen, at intervals of two and three miles, along the water's edge, while the plastered and whitened habitations of the missionaries and chieftains, and the cottages of the common people, studded the shores in long perspective, till, at a distance of five and six miles on either side, low points, richly covered with cocoanut trees, terminated the view.

The most conspicuous objects were now still the same ; but, with a noonday sun and misty atmosphere, they were seen under every disadvantage of shade and coloring, and excited a less lively admiration, than they otherwise would have done.

While two or three miles from Point Venus, we were boarded by a boat containing one of the inferior magistrates of the district, in a dress of nankeen pantaloons, round jacket of blue silk, white shirt, and black cravat, with a Guayaquil hat. He introduced himself with great civility, and tendered his services to pilot the ship into the bay ; but Captain Finch learning from him, that there was a regular pilot appointed by the government, declined the offer till he should come off, and till Mr. Lardner, our sailing master, should go in with a cutter and make some observation for himself, as to the best anchorage.

In the meantime a boat was lowered, and Lieutenant Dornin dispatched on a visit to the Rev. Mr. Wilson, the resident missionary at Matavia. Having a slight personal acquaintance with Mr. Wilson, I accompanied him. We were received very kindly by this gentleman on the beach, and accompanied him to his cottage, a few rods distant, on the bank of a considerable river, running from the mountains through this part of the district. Finding him at leisure to go off to the ship, and knowing that our return would be looked for with impatience, after an introduction to Mrs. Wilson and her daughters, and a few moments conversation, we took our leave till the Vincennes should be at anchor.

The trade-wind was blowing very fresh, with a heavy sea for a small boat, and the row off was tedious and unpleasant; we reached the ship without accident, however, and the pilot having at the same time joined her, we passed round the Dolphin—as a shoal, extending from Point Venus some distance along the shore, is called—and dropped anchor inside of it, within a mile of the beach, nearly opposite a high red bank, called “one tree hill.”

Mr. Wilson remained to dinner with the captain, and then landed to secure permission from the proper authorities, for the interment of a lad who had died on board, the night previous, of a consumption. Some objection was at first made by the natives, lest the disease, with which he had died, might have been contagious; but when assured, that this was not the case, a grave was prepared in the burial ground of the chapel ; in which, at sunset, with slow procession and an admonitory service, we deposited the body—there to rest till “time shall be no longer.”

I remained at Mr. Wilson’s to tea, in company with the captain and surgeon ; and passed most of the evening at his cottage, in agreeable conversation. It was nine o’clock before we returned to the ship ; the row off was delightful—a fine moon throwing a double charm, by its brightness, over the loveliness of the scenery around.

From an early hour in the morning till noon to-day, the Vincennes was crowded with people from the shore, bringing various articles of refreshment and curiosity, for trade and barter. Ignorance of the comparative value of the articles they have to dispose of, and those they wish to secure ; and anxious to make the exchange at the highest rate of gain on their part, the exorbitance of their demands and their seeming cupidity, are in some cases such, as to be exceedingly vexatious to those attempting to deal with them ; but, there is nothing of the wild shouting, rudeness, and nakedness, so annoying at Nukuhiva—nor any thing in their whole appearance that is offensive, or indicative of any trait of character not to be found, in every market-place in a civilized and Christian country.

The effect produced on them by our band, in comparison with that on the Nukuhivans, was very striking, and very pleasing. It is long since they have acquired a taste for the combination of sounds characterizing the music of European countries ; and since, they have learned themselves to sing various parts in sacred music, with correctness and some degree of taste. Though the Nukuhivans would listen to the band for a first time, with a kind of wonder and momentary gratification, it was evident they had no particular relish for the style of music, or harmony of sounds produced by it; and, doubtless, thought it unequal, in the pleasure it afforded, to the monotonous beat of the drum, and the dull recitative of their own songs—but here, when the musicians were ordered on deck, hundreds clustered round in the manifest expectation of a rich enjoyment; and the moment they commenced playing, they hung in the rigging and upon the guns, in a silent delight, which none could avoid observing; while many evidently drank in the strains of varied harmony, with all the luxury of enjoyment of so many amateurs at home, at the performance of the first masters in the country.

During the forenoon we had a visit from the chief justice of the island—a respectable-looking, well-dressed, and dignified old man—at present at Matavai for the trial of several persons accused of sedition. He held a court at sunrise this morning, which I should have been glad to have attended, had I been apprised of it in time. Two or three persons were convicted of the transgression of special laws, and received the sentence annexed to the respective statutes broken.

You are aware, that before the death of Pomare II., in 1821, a regular code of laws—including an equitable judiciary, and the important right of trial by jury—adapted to the state into which the nation had been brought, by a conversion from paganism to Christianity, was drawn up by the Rev. Mr. Nott, one of the first missionaries that came to the islands, and adopted by the king and whole body of chiefs in public council. Every law has a specific penalty attached—rendering the administration of justice, after the guilt of a person is established, perfectly equal: no discretion being left to the judge, in a modification of the sentence. The rehearsal of the law and its penalty, both of which are familiar to the person under trial—as every family is furnished with a printed copy of the code—is the only judgment pronounced.

With the “Polynesian Researches” of our beloved friend Ellis before you, it will be unnecessary, however, for me to enter upon any elucidation of facts of this kind, that may come under my notice, during the visit we shall make at the Georgian and Society Islands. The original state of the people as found by the missionaries, their habits and customs, their religion, civil polity, and history—including the conversion of both groups from idolatry, the establishment of Christianity, and their present condition—are portrayed in his volumes with so much talent and such lively interest, with such perfect candor and minute correctness, and in such fullness of information, that I at once refer you to them for every thing connected with this section of the South Seas, except the incidents which may pass under the immediate observation of myself and shipmates, the few days we may remain within its limits.

LETTER II.

HARBOR OF PAPEETE.

August 26th, 1829. }

Mr. and Mrs. Wilson and daughters dined with Captain Finch on Monday; and on Tuesday, a party from the ward-room and steerage, consisting of the lieutenants Stribling, Dornin, and Lardner, Dr. Wessels, midshipmen Maury, Keith, Hawkins, and myself, visited the harbor of Papeeté, six or seven miles westward of Matavai.

The scenery along the intervening shore, beautiful by nature—both in wild mountain and palmy plain—is now doubly so, from the neat cottages and lofty chapels, which, at the short intervals of two and three miles, insensibly blend thoughts of civilization and piety, with the impressions made on the mind by the luxuriance and grandeur of the natural imagery. We sailed the whole distance within a coral reef, which, shortly after leaving Matavai, lines the coast at a half a mile from the beach to the entrance of the harbor, and arrived at Papeeté at eleven o'clock.

The bay, about three miles in circumference, is formed by an indenture of the shore between two points covered with groves of cocoanut trees; while the coral reef in front—through which there is an entrance by a narrow ship channel—with a small islet based upon it, protects it so fully from the swell of the sea, that it is, at all times, as smooth as a lake. The panorama, from the anchorage, is rich and lovely. A spacious and elevated white chapel presents a conspicuous and pleasing object in the centre of the view inland. On one side of this, within a neat inclosure planted with shrubbery, stands the cottage of the resident missionary; and on the other, corresponding to it, the parish school-house: from both of which the habitations of the natives—some in the primitive and some in the modern style of building—stretch in half embowered perspective along the curvature of the beach, to the cocoanut points, jutting on either hand, at a distance of half a mile or more, in heavy groves towards the reef. Clumps of the orange and lemon tree—of the hibiscus and pandanus, with rich plantations of the bread-fruit, cocoanut, and broad-leafed banana, and here and there a single tree of the lofty and wide spreading vi—spondias dulcis—fill up the remaining parts of the foreground; while lofty and abrupt hills, overtopped by bold and verdant mountains, complete the sketch interior.

Our party was welcomed on the beach, by Mr. Marenhaut, a Dutch gentleman temporarily at Tahiti, and by Captain Brock, late commander of an English vessel wrecked on the eastern side of the island—both of whom had visited the Vincennes the first day of her arrival. Learning from them, that the Rev. Mr. Pritchard, the missionary at this station, was quite ill, we accompanied them to their cottage, before calling at the mission house.

At twelve o'clock, we paid our respects to Mr. and Mrs. Pritchard; and were delighted with the neatness, taste, and beauty of their humble dwelling. Mr. Pritchard, a well educated and intelligent man, though much indisposed, received us with great cordiality and kindness; and in Mrs. Pritchard, we were pleased to meet, in this happy and honorable exile, a refined and lovely woman. Their little parlor—though furnished with a plainness and simplicity appropriate to the situation and character of the occupants—wore an aspect of refinement and cultivation that bespoke a familiarity with more polished scenes than those in which they are now found. Two fine, healthful, and neatly dressed children, beside their mother on a sofa, added greatly to the charm of a home scene, so welcome to us, after the exhibitions of heathenism with which we had been conversant at Nukuhiva. An hour passed rapidly away under such circumstances; when we took leave, to pass over the bay to the islet in front of the harbor, where we had made arrangements to partake a repast, furnished from stores brought with us from the Vincennes.

This is a delightful little spot; a few rods only in circumference, but covered with groves, in miniature, of almost every variety of growth found on the mainland. Beneath the thick shade of these, fanned by a refreshing sea breeze, we enjoyed our pic-nic till it became time to return to the ship, as we intended calling on the way at a point two miles above,

The habitation of Mr. Bicknell is a respectable, new frame building—weather boarded at the sides and end with a roof of thatch in the native style—the wooden part being neatly painted in cream color, with doors, Venetian blinds, and a covered veranda in green. Within, the arrangement, finish, and furniture, correspond with the neatness, and even elegance, for this part of the world, of the exterior: while horses and mules, herds of cattle and flocks of goats in the adjoining enclosures—a sugar mill and boilers, and a warehouse filled with beautifully grained sugar, molasses, and rum—testify to the resources, and promising circumstances of the proprietor. On landing, in front of the establishment, we were received at the gate, and very kindly welcomed by Mr. Bicknell, introduced to Mrs. Bicknell, and welcomed to the hospitality of his house.

From this point, a part of our number walked along the beach to the residence of Mr. Nott. It was quite dark before we reached his grounds, and we called with the intention of stopping a moment only; but the kindness and hospitality of himself and wife obliged us to remain to a cup of tea; and it was late in the evening, before, much gratified with our visit, we rejoined our barge, and rowed in safety beneath a lovely sky, the remaining distance to the Vincennes.

On Thursday, I made a second visit to Papeeté, with Lieutenants Magruder and Sullivan, and Midshipmen Irving, Maury, Taylor, and Anthony. We spent the day much in the manner of the last ; but in returning, young Anthony and myself took a turnpike, which has been constructed almost entirely around the island—a distance of near a hundred miles—as far as Mr. Nott's, at Pare. This road is a fine and praiseworthy work for such a people—the labor principally of convicts, proved guilty of various breaches of the laws. It is a broad, gravel way, extending, for the most part, in a direct line from point to point along the coast; smoothly and well finished, and provided with narrow bridges of plank over the water courses and streamlets, running from the mountains to the sea. Thickly embowered with luxuriant groves of various trees—skirted, here and there, with the humble but comfortable habitations of the islanders—opening occasionally upon a bright glade or extensive meadow land, with fine views of the mountains on one side, and the ocean on the other, it is, in many places, beautiful as a drive in the pleasure grounds of an American mansion, or the park of a gentleman in England.

The distance we travelled over it at this time, was about three miles ; and we were treated with great civility and kindness by all whose habitations we passed, and by those met on our way. Within about a mile of Mr. Nott's, a side road leads to the point occupied by the residences of the royal chieftains ; and we turned into it, for the purpose of visiting their establishment.

Pomaré III., only surviving son of Pomaré II., having died in his childhood two years since, while pursuing his education at the South Sea Academy, on the neighboring island of Eimeo or Morea, as the natives more frequently call it, was succeeded in the supreme authority of 'Tahiti, Eimeo, Tabuae-manu, or Sir George Sanders' Island—which three constitute the Georgian cluster—by an only sister, under the style of Pomaré Vahine I. of Tahiti, or the Female Pomaré I. of Tahiti. She is now about eighteen, and has been married some years to the eldest son of the prince, or head chief of Tahaa, one of the Society Islands, a hundred miles or more northwest of Tahiti and Eimeo.

Tamatoa, king of Raiatea, the principal island of that group is the maternal grandfather of the young queen, and she with her husband, mother, and an aunt—both daughters of the king of Raiatea, and associated in a regency during the minority of the queen—is at present on a visit there. We of course did not expect to find any person of much distinction; and were received by an inferior chief and his wife, left in charge of the establishment during the absence of the party.

These two are a respectable couple of middle age; and occupy a large, airy, and well kept house, standing near the sea side. A Sandwich Island woman is residing with them at present—the wife of an Hawaiian, sent to Tahiti by Governor Boki, of Oahu, as supercargo of the brig Ainoa, in a voyage from which she has just returned to the Sandwich Islands. The supercargo has remained, to dispose of the goods; and is, at present, with the queen's party at the Society Islands, while his wife keeps a shop for the disposal of Chinese goods, blank books, stationery, slates, pencils, &c., and various articles of hardware, all in demand here, and purchased for cocoanut oil and arrow root. It is not believed, however, from the character of the agent, that this attempt in commercial enterprise will prove very profitable to the governor.

The point is covered with majestic and delightful groves, beneath which is the habitation of the queen, and the dwellings of her immediate dependents. Her house of frame, wattled and plastered, has an entrance, hall, and four rooms on the ground floor, besides an attic; and is a neat and comfortable building, but, in the absence of the royal party, unfurnished and shut up.

The mausoleum of Pomaré II.—in which the remains of his son Pomaré III. are also deposited—like the dwelling of the queen, is a white plastered house, in a large enclosure, embowered in the deepest shades of the groves. Near it, a section of the great royal chapel erected by him after his conversion to Christianity, is still standing; and is kept in good repair as a school-house. The original area of the building was more than seven hundred feet in length, by fifty in breadth.

A short distance farther towards Matavai, on an elevated and conspicuous site, stands the chapel of the Rev. Mr. Nott—a neat, well-finished, and even elegant place of worship. It is an oval, ninety-eight feet in length by fifty in breadth, two stories high, with numerous windows furnished with Venetian blinds. The roof is a beautiful thatch; and the floor, seats, and pulpit, neatly wrought from timber of the bread-fruit tree. The whole is of native workmanship; and would compare to advantage, both in appearance and comfort, with most country churches, in any part of the United States. We joined the boat again at this spot, and reached the Vincennes early in the evening.

On a following day, I made the same excursion for a third time, with Captain Finch and a small party. In going we sailed outside the reef, and entered the harbor by the ship channel. The only incident of interest, varying this from the preceding visits, was the attendance of an hour at a school under the charge of Mr. Pritchard. The number of scholars was about one hundred and fifty of both sexes, from six, to ten and twelve years of age. It is established on the monitorial system; and the exhibition made by the pupils of native intelligence, and their proficiency in reading and writing, in rehearsing hymns and portions of scripture, in answering catechetical questions, and in singing, were such as greatly to interest and gratify us; and to elicit from Captain Finch—in an address to the scholars, interpreted by Mr. Pritchard—high encomiums on the attainments they had already made, and warm encouragement to a persevering attention to the means of improvement and intelligence with which they are favored.

The handwriting of many was quite equal to that of children of the same age, in schools in America; and the elder scholars are pursuing an elementary course in arithmetic, geography, and history. Very few district schools in the interior of our own country, are accommodated with so pleasant, convenient, and spacious a school-house; and no school that could be visited, would present an appearance of greater neatness in the children, more brightness and happiness of look, modesty of apparel, and order and propriety of deportment. Schools of a similar kind are under the daily superintendence of the missionaries at every station; and facilities for securing the arts of reading and writing at least, are thus afforded to the whole population.

LETTER III.

A TAHITIAN SABBATH.

August 22d, 1829. }

THE first missionaries to the Georgian Islands, having made the voyage from England by the Cape of Good Hope, without an allowance for the gain of time in sailing eastward, were on their arrival at Tahiti, a half day and more in advance of visitors, coming to the islands by Cape Horn. This difference still continues; and, consequently to-day, though only Saturday, the 22d, in the record on board the Vincennes, is Sunday, the 23d, on shore.

A number of the officers and crew attended the services of Mr. Wilson's chapel, both in the morning and afternoon. The exercises on each occasion were so similar, that I shall speak only of those of the morning worship, which I witnessed, in company with Captain Finch and a party from the ward-room and steerage.

We landed at nine o'clock, previously to which we had seen the people, in large numbers, going to, and returning from, a prayer meeting at sunrise. Hearing the sound of recitations in the school-house—a neat and comfortable building between the cottage of Mr. Wilson and the chapel—we directed our course to it. A sabbath school, consisting of about one hundred and fifty boys and girls, from the ages of three and four years to fifteen and seventeen, was here assembled, in which several respectable, middle aged men acted as teachers and superintendents, while others of the same age and character walked along the passages at the sides and centre of the building, holding long, slender rods of the light hibiscus, with which to touch any of the younger scholars, when disposed to be mischievous and troublesome. Many of the parents and friends were also present as spectators.

When we entered, the whole school was repeating the answers of a catechism simultaneously, with great promptitude and correctness. This was followed by a recitation from the Bible, in which one scholar would rehearse a section of a chapter, and another that succeeding—thus alternating from individual to individual, and from class to class, with the greatest readiness; and manifesting, by the unhesitating manner in which they continued the exercise from verse to verse, and chapter to chapter, no ordinary tenacity and strength of memory. A hymn was then sung, in which all joined ; when the school was closed with an appropriate prayer by the superintendent. Mrs. Wilson and her daughters were present as teachers and managers of the female scholars ; and in the whole aspect of the school, there was a cleanliness and propriety of dress, and personal appearance, and an intelligence and order equal to those found in any of the kind in our own country.

While at prayer,

with its sweet and elevating associations in the pious mind, began to reach us from a neighboring grove ; and shortly after, the scholars, in a procession of two and two—the boys led by a native superintendent, and the girls by Mrs. Wilson and her daughters—quietly made their way to a temple of God, founded within the last fifteen years, on the ruins of altars which for time unknown had been steeped in blood. Crowds of islanders, of every grade, were also seen gathering, by well-made gravel walks, leading in various directions, beneath the thick shade of the trees covering the point, to the same spot, all clad in neat and modest apparel, principally white, of their own or foreign manufacture : and exhibiting in their whole aspect, a dignity and respectability of character becoming a Christian people. Almost every individual had in his hand a copy of the portions of the scripture, translated into the language of the group, and a book of hymns.

The chapel is a large and neat building, one hundred and ten feet long, and forty broad; lofty, airy, and well finished in all its parts, and wholly of native workmanship. The number of worshippers amounted to about four hundred—the usual congregation at this place—including almost entirely the population of the vicinity. The whole appearance of the people—their attention and seeming devotion, during the exercises of reading the scriptures, singing, prayer, and preaching—was as markedly decorous as would be expected or seen, in America or England: and such as to make a deep impression on my own mind. A single glance around, was sufficient to convince the most sceptical observer of the success and benefit of missions to the heathen; for it could not be made, without meeting the plainest demonstration, that such can be rescued from all the rudeness and wildness of their original condition, can be brought to a state of cleanliness and modesty in their personal appearance, can be taught to read and to write—for many, besides the intelligent and familiar use of the scriptures and their hymn book, took notes in pencil of the sermon delivered—in a word, can be transformed into all that civilization and Christianity vouchsafes to man.

After worship we perceived a large portion of the middle aged and elderly men, and many of the younger to remain in the chapel, while an equal proportion of the females repaired to the school-house. On inquiring the object of this, we learned that it was customary for the members of the church, and persons seriously disposed, to spend a half hour or more after service, in conversation on the subject of the discourse of the missionary, and in prayer for a blessing upon its truth to themselves, and to all who heard it.

Between the hours of public worship, I joined the mission family in an English service of singing, reading, and prayer, in Mr. Wilson's parlor. The greatest quietude reigned around; and the whole external observance of the day by the natives, in a suspension of all ordinary occupations and amusements, was such as to be worthy the imitation of older and more enlightened Christian nations.

LETTER IV.

VISIT TO EIMEO, AND ARRIVAL AT THE SOCIETY ISLANDS.

Island of Raiatea, }
Sept. 1st, 1829. }

ON the morning of the 26th ult., a party, of which I made one, sailed in two boats for the island of Eimeo, or Moorea, twelve or fifteen miles west of Tahiti. The Rev. Mr. Wilson kindly accompanied us in the excursion. On reaching the north end of the island, for which we steered on leaving Matavai, we entered within a reef skirting it at a distance of a quarter of a mile, and passing by the mouth of the bay of Paopao, or Cook's harbor—at present uninhabited—reached the missionary settlement at Papetoai, at the bay of Opunohu, or Talu, a few miles farther west, early in the afternoon.

The scenery along the northern shore, is delightful—both bays lying cradled, like lakes, in the midst of mountains of the most picturesque wildness, and of the richest verdure. The whole surface of Eimeo is much more broken than that of Tahiti; and from whatever point viewed, its contour abounds in lofty pinnacles and shafts of wooded rock and mountain. We were received on the beach by the Rev. Mr. Simpson, and most hospitably entertained by himself and lady, and Mrs. Armitage, at their comfortable dwellings. Mr. Armitage was absent at Afareaitu, a station we afterward visited on the eastern side of the island.

Papetoi does not differ materially from Matavai and Papeeté, in the evidences of civilization and piety it presents. The chapel is very superior, and more substantial than any other building yet erected in the South Seas, being of hewn coral, not dissimilar in its appearance to a light free-stone or marble. It is an octagon, sixty or seventy feet in diameter, well plastered and whitewashed within, and furnished with convenient seats constructed of the timber of the bread-fruit tree. The gallery, and a handsome pulpit, are of the same material.

Early the next morning we left for Afareaitu, returning to the northeast point inside of the reef, and then coasting along the eastern shore, eight or ten miles, to a little islet marking the entrance of the harbor. Afareitu is a lovely spot, surrounded by magnificent and beautiful objects. The South Sea academy, chapel, and cottages of the natives—stretching in a long line of whiteness around the bay, at the water's edge, beneath mountains springing almost perpendicularly more than three thousand feet high—present a delightful scene as you row in from the sea; and show what additional beauty the hand of art and civilization can scatter over the splendors of natural scenery.

The Rev. Mr. Orsmond, principal of the academy, and Mr. Blossom—associated with him in the secular affairs of the institution and of the missionary station—gave us a most cordial and hospitable reception. We had the gratification also of meeting Mr. Armitage, who is preparing to remove his family from Papetoi to Afareaitu, and to establish a cotton manufactory at the latter place, after an unsuccessful experiment at the former.

On this subject, however, and on others of a similar kind, as well as on the South Sea Academy, its design, success, &c., I must again refer to the “Polynesian Researches” of our friend Ellis, in which you will find every desirable information respecting them.

During the afternoon of Thursday, we made a water party for the missionaries and children of the academy, and visited the islet on the reef in front of the settlement. It commands a beautiful view of bay and mountains; and I occupied the time we were upon it, principally in taking a sketch, to add to the collection already in my portfolio.

Our kind friends furnished us with a repast before dawn on the morning of the 28th; and immediately after, bidding them farewell, with grateful feelings for the hospitality with which we had been entertained, we left the harbor, on our return to the ship, while the stars were yet twinkling in the sky. Early in the day, the trade wind set in so freshly that the channel between the islands became very rough; and we were glad to secure an entrance through the reef, twelve or fourteen miles to the leeward of Matavai. It was in the vicinity of the missionary station occupied by the Rev. Mr. Darling—of whose residence and printing establishment, chapel, and the habitations of the islanders in the vicinity, we had a fine, though distant sight.

On gaining the harbor of Papeete, we landed, on the island at its mouth, to partake of some refreshment in the coolness of its groves. The necessity of looking to our provision-chest, however, was anticipated by the arrival of Mr. Pritchard in his boat from the shore, with one or two attendants bearing a tray of delicacies, politely furnished by Mrs. Pritchard, who, aware of the necessity we should be under of returning by Papeete, and of the probability of our arriving weary and exhausted, had in this manner kindly borne us in mind. On re-embarking we called at the mission-house to make our acknowledgments, and left in time only to reach the Vincennes, at a seasonable hour, in the evening.

On the first sabbath we were at Matavai, Mr. Pritchard preached on board the Vincennes, and with the Rev. Mr. Crook, from a distant station on the southern side of the island, spent the day with us; and on the last, Mr. Pritchard, Mr. Wilson, Mr.

Marenhaut, and Captain Brock, were at worship, and dined on board. In the evening Mr. Stribling and myself went on shore to take leave of Mrs. Wilson and her daughters; and at ten o'clock on Monday, the Vincennes took her anchor, and bore away for the Society Islands, a hundred miles distant.

It was the intention of Captain Finch to have touched at Huahine, the most eastern of this group; and last evening after passing Tabuae-manu, at too great a distance to discern it distinctly, I retired to my cot, with the pleasing anticipation of making an early visit on shore at Fare, the station and settlement in pastoral charge of the Rev. Mr. Barff, long the colleague, and still the intimate friend of Mr. Ellis. The wind, however, was light and unfavorable during the night, and by morning we had fallen so much to the leeward of the whole island, that it was determined to proceed without delay to Raiatea, also in sight. I was greatly disappointed; and could scarce feel reconciled to the idea of not visiting, at least for an hour, the scene of the principal residence in the South Seas of one I so highly respect and so sincerely love.

Huahine, though not so wild in contour, is equally verdant and beautiful in its general appearance as Eimeo—and its characteristic features very like the central sections of Oahu, at the Sandwich Islands. When nearest to it, we were not more than ten miles from its western shore, with this island and Tahaa on the north of it, in full view—while Borabora, a fourth in the group, appeared loftily but dimly in the distance.

By twelve o'clock we had approached so near the northern end of Raiatea, as to distinguish the chapel and cottages of the settlement, with a flag-staff and the banner of the nation—a broad horizontal stripe of white between two of red—flying from its top. At the same time a native pilot boarded us, and carrying the ship through a narrow opening in the reef, with a small island on either hand, brought us safely to anchor opposite the village, a mile and a half north of the entrance, by which we had passed within the reef.

We are in the midst of another varied and beautiful panorama. The ship lies within a short distance of the shore, which is richly edged with groves and single trees, and a fine undergrowth of the banana, sugar-cane, and various shrubbery, surrounding and overhanging the white cottages of the inhabitants. These stand thickly, in regular lines, along a single street, two miles or more in length, and are backed by abrupt hills, covered with grass and bushes, till they rise into a bold cliff with a flattened top, standing high above the settlement, and forming a striking landmark in approaching the island on the eastern side. Beneath this, on the north, several low points, luxuriantly clothed and spotted with dwellings, jut far into the channel—while beyond them, at a distance of twenty miles, the lofty and shell-like peaks of Borabora tower against the sky, in a blueness almost equal to its own.

Eastward of this island, and within half the distance, the green points of Tahaa, inclosed in the same reef with Raiatea, stretch, like the spread fingers of a hand, into the sea—the only object on it, in distinct view, being a stately chapel, which rises like a palace on the eye, against the darkness of the hills behind. Still further in the east, lies the open ocean, separated from us only by the reef—a few hundred rods distant—on which a never ceasing surf rises, crests, and breaks, in a thousand forms of varied beauty, as it sends its voice “of many waters” far along the echoing shore. While behind us are the tufted islets, marking the passage by which we entered, with numerous palmy points along the coast of Raiatea, and Huahine across a wide channel in the distance.

Our arrival attracted little attention; not a canoe came off, nor did any collection of persons on the shore, or other appearance, indicate the childish excitement usual, among uncivilized people, on such occasions. From the pilot we learned, that Tamatoa, the king of Raiatea, and the whole royal party from Tahiti, were at the adjoining island of Tahaa; and it was not till the cool of the evening, that any of the ship’s company landed. I then went on shore, with several gentlemen of the ward-room.

The landing is on a substantially laid quay of coral, where we met an intelligent lad of twelve years,—the son of Rev. Mr. Williams, the missionary of the station. He informed us that his father was at the chapel, delivering a customary weekly lecture; and on directing our walk up the street, we met and returned with him to the mission house, and were introduced to Mrs. Williams and her family. Their establishment is more neat and rural, and more comfortable in its whole arrangement, than any we have before seen. The house is large and convenient—having three pleasant rooms in front, opening by large folding doors on a veranda extending the entire length of the building—and commands, across an inclosure filled with shrubbery, fruit, and flowers, a fine view of the ocean. Every thing around looked neat and prosperous; and, on taking a walk through the village, we found the same features marked, in a greater or less degree, on the habitations and appearance of the people every where. Still, we are told, that the evidences of improvement in the arts and manner of life here, are not equal to those exhibited at the neighboring island of Huahine.

On a long coral wharf, near the residence of the king—and from that circumstance called the king's wharf—a small vessel of Mr. Williams' is undergoing repairs, and the keel of another, of forty or fifty tons, belonging to the king, is laid. The timbers in both, are of the tamanu—inophyllum callophyllum—a native tree, thought equal to the American live oak for ship building; and the workmen, islanders under the direction of an English carpenter.

LETTER V.

INTERVIEW WITH THE KING TAMATOA, AND A SABBATH AT RAIATEA.Island of Raiatea, }
Sept. 5th, 1829. }

Mr. Williams called upon Captain Finch and the officers of the ship, early on the morning after our arrival, and there has been since, a daily and almost hourly interchange of civility and kindness between the Vincennes and mission house. Some of our number spend every evening on shore; and Mr. and Mrs. Williams and family, and Mrs. Hunter, the wife of a Captain Hunter, at present on the South American coast, have passed a day with us on ship board.

Learning that the wife of the king had not accompanied him to Tahaa, Captain Finch and myself paid her a visit on the morning of the 3d instant. The king's house is a respectable building of frame, wattled, plastered, and whitewashed, in the manner now extensively introduced throughout the Georgian and Society Islands. It is in the cottage style, of one story, with a roof of thatch, and has four rooms on the floor—one large and airy, used as a reception hall, and the others smaller, appropriated as sleeping and dressing apartments. The former has four glazed windows and two large doors—one in pannels of wood opening on the street, and the other of glass, towards the sea, from which it is separated by a small inclosure of grass and shrubbery.

We were shown into this, while the queen, who was at another residence, was informed of our wish to see her. The wood work is neatly painted, the floors covered with fine mats, and the walls lined with settees of native workmanship, from the timber of the bread-fruit, with seats and backs of beautifully braided cord of the fibre of the cocoanut husk. We took the liberty of opening the doors of the adjoining rooms, and found them all furnished with well-made bedsteads, covered with several thicknesses of soft mats, in place of mattresses, and spread with counterpanes of India print. A drapery of white tapa, or native cloth, around the windows and on canopies over the beds, gave an air of great neatness and comfort to the whole. Many of the cottages of the common people, into which we looked, bear, both within and without, similar marks of order and respectability.

The queen soon arrived, attended by four or five pretty looking young women, in European dresses. She is fifty or sixty years of age, and highly respectable in her appearance, with traces of early beauty still discoverable, in her features and expression of countenance. Her dress was a loose slip of white cambric, with a pau, or native petticoat, of blue and white, in cross-bar over it; and a long shawl and straw bonnet. She is very sedate in her manners; and deported herself with great propriety during the interview. Immediately after the arrival of the Vincennes, an express had been dispatched for the king, and she informed us, that he would probably reach Raiatea early the same evening.

This was the case ; and yesterday morning, Captain Finch, accompanied by the surgeon and Lieutenants Dornin, Magruder, Lardner, and myself, waited upon him. We were received in the same room as on the preceding day ; and the interview with Mr. Williams, as interpreter, was interesting and pleasant. Tamatoa, without being corpulent, is one of the tallest and largest men I ever saw. Standing, when he rises—in gigantic proportions of limb and muscle—fully a head and shoulders above all around him. He is dignified in his manner, and converses with much good sense and intelligence. The captain informed him of the general objects of the visit of the Vincennes to the South Seas ; of the policy he was instructed by our government, and desirous himself, to pursue ; and tendered the services of the ship, in any manner he might wish, during the period of our stay. He expressed himself much gratified, and thankful for the kindness of the government, and the politeness of the commander of the man-of-war.

On our way to the mission house, afterwards, we made a second call upon his wife, at a house occupied by her during the visit of the queen of Tahiti, to whom she has relinquished the use of the principal royal establishment. The building is a fine specimen of the original, native style of architecture—an oval some sixty feet in the longest diameter—surmounted by a beautiful roof of thatch, ten or twelve feet high at the eaves, and twenty or more in the centre. The sides and ends are composed of straight, round poles fastened perpendicularly in the ground, and lashed together at regular intervals of an inch, so as to admit an abundance of light and air within. The poles being of a white wood, and the thatch finished with the greatest neatness, the whole has a very pretty aspect ; and would furnish a model for a rustic pavilion, or summer house, in a park at home. The ground strewn with grass and laid with mats, constituted the floor.

We found the queen, like those of "olden time," in the midst of her maidens, at work—not at the loom or embroidering frame—but in weaving the more beautiful of the mats, manufactured at the islands. That which she was herself plating, not being so fine as some of the rest, she apologized for it, by remarking, that when young, no one excelled her in the art, but now that she was old, she was incapable of rivalling others. The example of occupation and industry thus presented, in the household of the first female in the nation, was pleasing and praiseworthy ; and she seemed gratified by the commendation it called from our party. Both the king and queen are very decidedly and sincerely pious ; and I observed, with pleasure, a Testament and hymn book, lying within reach of each of the females at work—evidently for use and not display, as our visit was entirely unexpected to them, and not intended by ourselves, till at the door of the house.

In the evening, Tamatoa took tea with Lieutenant Stribling and myself, at the mission house ; and is manifestly a sensible, dignified, and truly Christian ruler.

To-day has been the sabbath, on shore. The chapel here, like all we saw at the windward group, is large, well built, and a noble edifice, for such a people. It is not less than a hundred and twenty feet in length, and proportionately wide, calculated to seat two thousand hearers. The usual congregation varies from a thousand to twelve hundred. The number assembled to-day amounted to about eleven hundred ; all well and neatly clad, and exhibiting in their whole appearance and manner of attending the service, every characteristic of civilization, respectability and piety, found in any common congregation in the United States. But for the color of the audience, indeed, it would have been difficult for any one to believe himself worshipping with those, who, till within a few years, had been lost in all the gross vice, licentiousness, and wildness of paganism. The sight was at once delightful and affecting.

The dress of the men, from the king to the most unimportant individual present, consisted of a white shirt, and black silk or colored cravat, with a fine fringed mat, several yards in length, or a piece of muslin or calico of the same size, wrapped loosely from the loins to the knee, in a manner to resemble the drawers or trowsers of the eastern nations. A straw hat worn out-doors finished the attire. The females, in general, were in white muslin slips, with large mantles of calico or of native cloth over them ; and bonnets of straw. Many, however, were dressed altogether in the European fashion, except the unbecoming deficiency in our eyes, of shoes and stockings—a luxury scarce attainable by the first chieftains in the group.

The old queen was conspicuous, in a white India muslin, handsomely made, with yellow silk handkerchief, fine ruff, satin sash, and modish straw hat and trimmings—a present from the governor of New South Wales. In many accidents of feature and manners, this individual is uncommonly like one of the most distinguished of our elderly female friends.

Captain Finch, and a dozen of the officers attended the chapel in the morning. Arrangements had been made to take the band along, to play a few pieces of sacred music at intervals in the service, for the gratification of many, who would have no other opportunity of witnessing the performance of the musicians. The exercises began, as on board ship, with the Portuguese hymn. I was fearful that the novelty might occasion some confusion: but it did not in the least. There was not the slightest unbecoming excitement; not even among the children, who took their seats together, as they entered in long procession from the sabbath school.

It was the day of the communion; and after the general congregation had been dismissed, about three hundred of both sexes, and of a variety of ages, with solemnity, and seemingly deep interest, partook of the emblems of the broken body and shed blood of Him, who gave his life a ransom for many. Much as the sincerity and piety of the church members in the Islands, have been doubted by the calumniators of the mission, from all I have observed and known, and from all passing before me on this occasion, I was led to the fervent prayer, that I might myself, at last, be equally worthy, with many of these, of a seat at the marriage supper of the Lamb.

Mr. Stribling and myself spent the evening with Mr. and Mrs. Williams. This we almost invariably do; and never without being deeply impressed by hearing, in the stillness of the night, the melody of the native hymn falling on the ear, in various directions, from the little cottages of islanders, as they engage in their evening devotions. Family worship, consisting of the reading of a portion of scripture, of a hymn, and of prayer, is universally practiced, not only in Raiatea, but throughout the whole nation.

LETTER VI.

AUDIENCE WITH THE QUEEN OF TAHITI, AND VISIT OF THE CHIEFS ON BOARD SHIP.

Island of Raiatea, }
Sept. 8th, 1829. }

ON the evening of the 6th inst., the queen of Tahiti, the dowager her mother, an aunt holding the office of regent, with a train of inferior chieftains, and a suite of followers, said to be the most lawless company in the two groups, arrived in two small vessels from Tahaa; and on the succeeding morning, a visit of ceremony was paid to the party, by Captain

Finch, and a number of the officers of the Vincennes.

The reputation of the Tahitian chieftains is far from being unspotted. The regent and dowager are both excommunicated members of the church ; and the young queen's character, according to common report, is not sans reproche. Their whole appearance, however, was most decorous ; and surpassed, in respectability, every anticipation we had been led to entertain. The interview took place, in the apartment already described, in the residence of king Tamatoa—the only alteration consisting in new mats on all the sofas, and in the introduction of two armed chairs at the upper end, as seats of honor, for the young queen, Pomaré, and her aunt, the regent.

We were introduced in the order of rank ; and found the cour to consist of Pomaré Vahine I., Ariipaea, regent, Tereomcèmoè queen dowager—both daughters of the king of Raiatea, the governess of Huahine, also his daughter—with their husbands—king Tamatoa and his wife, the governor of Tahaa, and several inferior chieftains, with four or five children, male and female, descendants of Tamatoa. Indeed, he is the patriarch of the whole number, being either the father, grand-father, uncle, or grand-uncle, by blood or marriage, of every chief person present. They were all dressed in European costume, varying in the expensiveness of the materials ; and more or less complete, in the articles constituting a full suit.

Mr. Williams, at the request of Captain Finch, attended as interpreter, and gave a full exposition of the nature and object of the visit of the Vincennes. The regent presided, the young queen saying nothing except through her, and then only in monosyllables. She is still young—only seventeen—of good figure and agreeable face, especially when smiling or in conversation, when she is better looking than most females we have seen, since leaving the Washington Islands.

While at Tahiti a complaint, well founded, as we ascertained, had been made to Captain Finch of the conduct of the queen and regent, in reference to some deserters from an American whale ship—natives of the Sandwich Islands, but regularly shipped members of the crew—which he thought necessary and desirable to bring forward. The subject evidently was not an agreeable one to the persons principally concerned; and we were quite amused, at the adroit manner in which the regent attempted to screen herself and the queen, from the censure to which she perceived they were exposed. The most wily diplomatist could scarce have exhibited more tact, in turning to good account an unfavorable aspect of things, or greater ingenuity in avoiding an unpleasant dilemma. After having placed the subject in a light, calculated to prevent a recurrence of similar conduct, the matter was pleasantly dismissed by the captain; and the official part of the audience closed, by an invitation to the whole company to visit the ship the next day.

The conference being thus ended, the king of Raiatea and his queen, accompanied by the dowager and regent of Tahiti, retired to one of the inner apartments, and returned shortly after, laden with beautiful mats and native cloth which they placed, as a present, at the feet of the captain: the regent giving that which she bore in the name of the young queen. At the same time, the street door was thrown open, and the steward of the queen's household stepping in, with an oratorical attitude and loud voice, pointed to a large quantity of provisions—cocoanuts, bananas, taro, potatoes, &c., with several hogs—placed in full view; and enumerating the whole in order, submitted them to the disposal of the captain, as a gift from his mistress to himself and officers.

When about taking leave, we were informed that a regular monthly meeting of the secondary chiefs, or land-holders, for the discussion of topics of public importance, was then taking place in the chapel; and, that a messenger had arrived, inviting our attendance.

This class of chiefs in Raiatea, consists of eight or ten individuals—tall and largely framed men, without an excess of corpulence; and dignified and highly respectable in their appearance and whole deportment. They are the staunch friends and supporters of all the institutions of civilization and piety, and evidently the very bones and sinews of the land. After being seated among them, several of the number, in short but animated and appropriate speeches, expressed the great pleasure it gave them to see a ship from the government of the United States at their island, and the happiness they had experienced in learning the kind sentiments, and in observing the amiable and condescending deportment of Captain Finch—asking, in conclusion, any advice he might think proper to address to them. In return, he assured them of every kind feeling towards themselves and people—testified to the interest and satisfaction with which he regarded the improvements and advances in civilization they had made, and encouraged them to unwearied attention, both in themselves and in their children, to the means of knowledge with which they were favored; and to the enactment and enforcement of wholesome laws. On which Uaeva, one of the most distinguished of the number, made the following reply :

“ Chieftain and Friend,

“ This is my speech to you. Great has been the joy of our hearts since your arrival among us, because of the kindness of your object in this visit. We greatly rejoiced on the sabbath day, for your presence with us in worshipping the Lord : and in bringing your band of beautiful music to unite with us in praise. This made our hearts very glad.

“ You are now advising us, and strengthening us in our small and feeble government—you are encouraging us in the acquisition of letters, and in the formation of laws : this is good. Should any thing prevent the benefit of this encouragement in the affairs of our government, still may your great nation countenance and promote the work of God among us Gentiles ; and patronize our teachers in doing their good work.

“ Health and salvation to yourself, chieftain, and to all the nobles and Christians of America !”

The incidents of the morning had a tendency to elevate our ideas of the state of the country, and of the true character of the people: and after some refreshments at the mission-house, we returned on board, much gratified with all we had seen and heard.

At the request of the queen, the band was sent on shore for an hour or two in the afternoon; and a kind of concert and oratorio given in the chapel, attended by the missionaries, many of the officers of the Vincennes, and a large concourse of royalty and plebeianism. The entertainment seemed highly gratifying to all; and as it had been a kind of gala day, rockets and fireworks were set off on board ship in the evening—a novelty to all on shore, except the Tahitians.

Early this morning, the ship was in order to receive our guests, and boats dispatched, at ten o'clock, to fetch them on board. The queen of Tahiti was handed over the side by the captain—the guard of marines presenting arms, and the band playing “Hail Columbia.” After the whole number had been escorted to the poop deck, a salute of fifteen guns was fired, during which we had proof that delicate nerves are not confined to the polished side of the globe. Many of the female noblesse of the party were greatly agitated; the good old queen of Raiatea sank to the deck, and I believe actually went to prayer; while her majesty of Tahiti, hanging on the captain’s arm in front of the rest, stood the first two or three guns forward very well, but as the gunners touched off the battery farther and farther aft, she began to retreat with a finger in each ear, but laughing, and exclaiming, "maitai! maitai!"—"good! good!" with a tremulous and terrified voice.

In a fashionable black satin dress, with deep ruff of thin muslin, a golden girdle and clasp, and a handsome round hat of fine straw trimmed with ribbons and flowers, she made quite a genteel appearance. Most of the others were equally well dressed.

The governess of Huahine I found to be one of the most intelligent of the company. We had quite an animated conversation before dinner, in which she exhibited a greater degree of information than I had expected. She appeared fully to understand the difference of government in the United States and at the islands—knew the elective nature of the presidential office—inquired the name of the present incumbent, and asked whether it was probable he would be chosen for another term, &c. &c. The general state of the Sandwich Islands is also familiar to her. She corresponds with some of the chiefs there, and says that the princess Harrieta is a very fine and pious girl—that it is feared the young king, her brother, may become dissipated—that Governor Boki is not very good, &c. The ex-queen Kekau-ruohi—a wife of Tamehameha I., and afterwards of his son Rihorihō or Tamehameha II.—is one of her friends; and from her, she has just received letters, with a box of presents—containing, among other articles, a boy's suit of crimson silk velvet, worn by one of the little chieftains on the present occasion.

This female and her husband, one of the finest looking men of the party, are both consistent and zealous members of the church. Speaking of the wealth and power of England and America, in comparison with the Islands, she remarked, that they were a poor people, but in the arts of reading and writing, and in a knowledge of the word of God, they still had the highest blessings: adding, that all the people, however, did not love these, and that she supposed it was in America and in England, as it was with them—that some were good and some were bad—some regarding and some disobeying the laws of God.

LETTER VII.

COMMUNICATION OF POMARE VAHINE I., TO THE PRESIDENT.

Sept. 16th, 1829. }

THE queen of Tahiti and party called on board this morning, after having embarked on their return to Tahaa. The appearance of the rabble, constituting a principal part of her train, in contrast with that of most of the islanders we have seen, either at the Georgian group or at this place, goes far to prove the reputed licentiousness of her household; and detracts greatly from the good impression made by the respectability and propriety of her personal deportment.

A principal object in visiting the Vincennes, was to commit to Captain Finch a letter, she has written to the President—of this Mr. Williams has furnished the following translation :

“ President,

“ In consequence of your kindness I write a letter to you. You sent a man-of-war formerly to our land, commanded by Captain Jones ; he treated us with great kindness. You have now sent another man-of-war, commanded by Captain Finch ; his kindness to us has also been great : we are highly pleased with his visit. I now write to you to express my gratitude ; also to inform you of our present state.

“ I am a female—the first queen of Tahiti—Queen Pomaré I. is my name. I am daughter to Pomaré II. When he died the government devolved on my little brother—he died, the government then became mine. I am young and inexperienced.

“ We have cast away the worship of idols, and have embraced the worship of our common Lord. In the year 1814 we embraced Christianity.

“ We have missionaries on the island, who are diligent in teaching us that which will promote our welfare. Some have been with us upwards of thirty years.

“ We have laws by which we are governed. I cannot send you a copy, I being on a visit to my grand-father at Raiatea.

“ Tahiti and Eimeo are the largest islands in my government. We have not many people—perhaps ten thousand.

“ There is not much property at my island—arrow-root and cocoanut oil are the principal. We have abundance of food, and excellent harbors for ships :

many American vessels call at Tahiti—tell them to continue to call, and we will treat them well.

“All kinds of cotton cloth are in demand here for barter—white, printed, blue—shawls, ribbons, axes, are all good property to bring, to procure refreshments.

“We have a new flag given us by Captain Lawes, of the Satellite, British man-of-war; will you kindly acknowledge it in traversing the seas, and in visiting you, as yours is by us—should that be the case at a distant period.

“Captain Finch has made myself, and mother, and aunt, with others, some handsome presents in your name, for which receive my gratitude. We are always glad to see American vessels at Tahiti. Continue to sail your vessels without suspicion. Our harbors are good and our refreshments abundant.

“Prosperity attend you, President of the United States of America—may your good government be of long duration.

QUEEN POMARE I.”

Tamatoa, the king of Raiatea, has also prepared a communication of similar import, to be transmitted to the president, by Captain Finch.

Lieutenant Stribling and myself attended a meeting this afternoon, held weekly by Mr. Williams, with those of his congregation who have been baptized. It is the intention of this gentleman, in the course of a few months, to make an extensive voyage among the islands west of the Georgian and Society groups; and to carry with him a number of the natives of Raiatea, of established piety, to be left as teachers, wherever it may be found practicable. Eight of his parishioners have given their names to him in view of this enterprise; and he chose this opportunity to communicate the fact to the members of the church; and to ask their opinion of the fitness of the individuals for the undertaking, and the propriety of their entering upon it.

The introduction of the subject led to a number of sensible, and excellent speeches. One of them contained a very pretty allusion to the visit of the Vincennes, and the policy of Captain Finch, with an application to the contemplated voyage of Mr. Williams. It was much as follows: "A large man-of-war is now with us. She has come from afar with kind motives and designs of good to ourselves and those like us. Her object is to learn our condition, and to encourage us to seek our own welfare. Her officers have their reward: they are covered and crowned with gold—they wear gold on their shoulders and gold on their heads, (alluding to the lace and epaulets of their uniform) it is their reward. My sentiment is that we too, send out a vessel to those more ignorant and poorer than ourselves, to do them good. Those of us who go on this expedition, will not, like these our friends, be crowned with gold for their reward. No! they will receive nothing in this world perhaps—still they shall be crowned. Yes! theirs shall be the crown of eternal life, to be given them, at last, by their Lord and Master Jesus Christ!"

The evening has been spent, as usual, at the mission-house. I have become much attached both to

Mr. and Mrs. Williams. Mrs. Williams is an amiable and intelligent woman—well educated and of good manners; and Mr. Williams is admirably fitted, in every respect, for a missionary; and long has been, and still is the instrument of immense good among this people.

LETTER VIII.

DEPARTURE FOR THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, at sea, {
September 14th, 1829. }

YESTERDAY morning, we have short before breakfast; and at nine o'clock took our anchor to bid farewell to the Society Islands. A native pilot—a fine looking and respectable man—conducted the ship to the open sea. Mr. Williams also politely accompanied us beyond the reef.

The egress from the harbor is not by the passage through which we entered, but round the north end of the island, six or eight miles from the settlement, on the opposite side. The channel is of easy and safe navigation; and the regular trade wind fair the whole distance. After gliding past the reef, and exchanging affectionate salutations with Mr. Williams, we filled away, in the direction of Borabora, twenty-five miles distant. This island is of a striking contour, and readily distinguished from any other of the group, by a central mountain, rising almost perpendicularly on every side, a height of more than two thousand feet. It is partially divided into two elevations or shafts, with a curvature on the southern side from the base to the top, giving it the appearance at a distance of a thin shell of rock.

There is a ship channel between Borabora and Tahaa, fifteen miles southeast of it; but we passed to the westward of both, and then ran north, with Maurua, the most leeward of the cluster, in sight, at a distance of thirty miles. Before evening we were near Tubai, a small coral island covered with coconut and pandanus, the last of the group; and at sunset, took a departure from it, with the hope of a speedy run over the two thousand five hundred miles separating us from the Sandwich Islands.

From the outline of our visit, at the Georgian and Society Islands, which I have thus given, you will perceive, dear H——, that I have left you to consult the recent publication of Mr. Ellis for all that is most important, in the history, present state, and prospects of their inhabitants. In the letters I have written, however, there is sufficient evidence, I trust, to prove them decidedly and interestingly a civilized and Christian people; and to present a conclusive and delightful demonstration of the power of the gospel on the nature, habits, and life of untutored man.

Their geographical location is such, that it may be long before they rise, as a nation, to any great degree of commercial or political importance, or by agricultural improvements—beyond those introduced in supply of a home consumption—and by trade, become richly furnished with the luxuries of wealth and refinement. Still, they possess every resource essential to the competence, comfort, and respectability of this life, while a knowledge of the Revelation of God, and the means of grace, unfold to them the hope and immortality of that which is to come. Their chapels and schools—their habitations and dress—their Bibles and their hymn books—their family circles and domestic altars, with a freedom from public licentiousness and open crime, speak volumes, in contrast with the state in which they once were, for the happiness they now enjoy.

If the aspect of the people in general, and the animated declaration and lively sensibility—even to tears seemingly of deep feeling—of those who have a full remembrance, and who largely shared in their own experience of the evils of heathenism, are to be accredited, the islanders themselves are far from being insensible to the benefit and blessing of the change they have experienced; and would not for worlds be deprived of the light and mercy they have received, or again be subjected to the mental and moral darkness, and various degradation from which they have escaped.

Yet there are those, who have visited the South Seas—men bearing the Christian name, with a reputation for science, and holding stations of honor—who have affected to discover a greater degree of depravity, and more wretchedness at Tahiti and Raiatea, than was known in the reign and terror of idolatry; and have ventured to proclaim to the world, that Christianity has here—for the first time in eighteen hundred years—had the effect of rendering the inhabitants vindictive and hateful, indolent and corrupt, superstitious and unhappy, and more pitiable, in all their circumstances, than when fully in a pagan state! And that the wars, introduced and encouraged by the MESSENGERS OF PEACE, have nearly exterminated the race!

Whence the data for such a sentiment could have been drawn, must forever remain a mystery, at least to all, who, like ourselves, have had the advantage of a personal observation in the case.

The last wars in the islands were previous to any influence gained, by the missionaries, over either chiefs or people. Since the establishment of Christianity there has been an uninterrupted peace; and as to other bloodshed, the Rev. Mr. Nott assured me, that he had not heard of a murder among the natives for fifteen years.

Theft is occasionally known, though we met with no evidence of it; and instances of secret vice and licentiousness doubtless occur; and may, when diligently sought, be found—though not honorably boasted of—by foreign visitors: but do these facts justify the assertion of a general and utter depravity? and do they forfeit the claim of the nation to the epithet, pure morals and genuine piety of a Christian people? As well might the traveller, in visiting New York or London, because he has suffered from a thief, or discovers a haunt of debauchery, gravely state in his journal, that there is not an honest man, or a virtuous woman in the United States, or in Great Britain—an assertion which I have heard made of the Society Islands—and that the state of the one nation is worse than in the time of the druids, and of the other, than when the red man alone prowled in her forests.

Such a presentation of the state of this people, can arise only from gross ignorance of their original condition, and from a very limited personal experience of the high happiness connected with the moral habits and spiritual affections of sincere piety. What were the characteristics, I would ask,—not now discoverable in the islanders—to be seen when they were in a state of heathenism? Only such, as would be exhibited in connection with facts, such as the following—facts to which I have, at the Sandwich Islands, when they were in a similar condition, myself been an eye-witness. A vessel would scarce have dropped her anchor, before she would have been surrounded and boarded, by crowds of hooting and shouting savages—men and women, almost, if not entirely, in the nakedness of nature, testifying their joy in a prospect of gain from the visitor, by every variety of rude noise and levity: and this only in prelude to a licentiousness of intercourse, extending frequently from the cabin to the fore-castle, too gross to be named, while pilfering, and dishonesty in every form,—filth, vermin, and disease followed in the train. Such would be the exhibitions on ship board—and what would be the character of those on shore?

No neatly whitened European cottage would meet the view, beneath the foliage of their groves, nor lofty temple invite the admiration of the eye, while it raised the thoughts to heaven; the hum of no thriving school would come like music on the intelligent ear, nor the hymn of devotion be heard floating on the breeze: but the putridity of a corpse, lying in cruel sacrifice before an idol of wood or stone, would direct to the altar of their gods, while the shouts and wild sounds of the song and dance, and the beating of drums, would proclaim a scene of revelry and sin.

And, could the veil be removed from all the iniquity of the system under which they dwelt, besides the terrors of superstition, by which they were burdened, and the many goading evils, arising from a slavery both of mind and soul, abominations would be disclosed against which the eye would revolt in involuntary disgust—while the shrieks of victims torn from their midnight slumbers to be hurried to a terrific death, and the plaintive moanings of infants, writhing in the agonies of dissolution, beneath the murderous grasp of an inhuman parent, would and fill the soul with a horror, not readily to be forgotten!

SANDWICH ISLANDS.

LETTER I.

ARRIVAL AT THE ISLAND OF HAWAII.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, off Hawaii, }
October 2d, 1829. }

AFTER a passage of eighteen days from Raiatea—including four of a dead calm, previously to taking the northeast trade wind—yesterday afternoon, at 5 o'clock, "land ho!" was called from the mast head.

I had been anxiously gazing, for an hour, from one of the quarter-boats, at a mass of clouds and mist on our lee-bow, expecting the outline of Hawaii momentarily to make its appearance. First rate chronometers, accurate sights, and nice calculations, enable us to judge very closely of the time of making land: and the sailing master having said, at 12 o'clock, that we should see the island between 3 and 5, we were almost certain that such would be the fact.

Before the call from aloft was made, my eyes had been fixed for some minutes, on what I believed to be the summit of MOUNAKEA; but I dared not assert it, lest I might be deceived: I was correct, however, though a thick haze prevented any more distinct sight of it. The southeast point, in the neighborhood of Kearakomo, was the only part clearly in view before dark, and that at a distance of forty or fifty miles.

Captain Finch did not fully determine, until a short time since, whether he would run on directly to Maui to-night, or lie to, and send a boat into Byron's bay in the morning. Much to my satisfaction, and indeed principally on my account, he has made up his mind to look in upon Hido: and thus to give me the interview of an hour, with those of our missionary friends who may be at that station, and, at the same time, an opportunity of learning the general news of the nations, before proceeding to Oahu.

Our voyage from the Society Islands has seemed long, and most tedious to me, notwithstanding its having, in reality, been short. A near approach to this group has necessarily given rise to many feelings and associations, both of joy and of pain; and, for the last few days, especially during and since the calm to which we were subjected, I have been as restless and feverish in mind, as a child on the point of realizing some long promised and eagerly anticipated delight; and have been incapable of confining my attention for an hour to any one subject. Such utter uncertainty hangs over the scenes immediately before me, that I find myself harassed by an exciting and painful impatience, when I ought to be under the exercise only of emotions of gratitude and joy, for the kind protection of God, in permitting me to reach this "desired haven" in health and safety.

As you, my dear H——, will readily believe, I was on deck this morning by day-break, in anticipation of a sunrise view of the land and mountains, as splendid and impressive as that with which we were favored, when under similar circumstances, on board the Thames in 1823—but I was disappointed: instead of the rich and mellow tints of a fine morning in the tropics, I found a beclouded sky with occasional strong puffs of wind and dashes of rain, while an impenetrable curtain of mist entirely cut off a sight of the land. By 7 o'clock, however, the rain had ceased—the clouds began to gather round the mountains, and the mist over the lowlands, retreating before the sun, left the wide districts of Puna and Hido, with their extensive forests and gradually ascending open grounds, in all their rich verdure and freshness in full view. We were then directly off Kapoho, the east point of the island—twenty-five or thirty miles south of Byron's Bay—and within twelve or fifteen miles of the shore.

For the last two hours, we have been running along the coast, which momentarily increases in richness. I am happy, that the ship's company thus have an opportunity of seeing this section of the country, so widely different from every thing on the leeward sides. Hawaii is, without hesitation, pronounced by them the finest and most important island we have yet seen: and evidently rich in its capacities for improvement.

We are now so near the entrance of the bay, that orders are given for two boats to be in readiness for lowering—one to carry me to the mission house, and the other to enable the sailing master to take a view of the harbor, that we may have it in our power to speak from observation of its advantages and disadvantages. I must, therefore, drop my pen—only to resume it, I trust, with good news from “a far country.”

LETTER II.

VISIT ON SHORE, AND DESCRIPTION OF THE SCENERY.

Mission House, at Byron's Bay, }
October 3d, 1829. }

You will be as much surprised, dear H——, at the place of my present date, as I am at the opportunity I enjoy of making it. When I wrote yesterday morning, I little thought of spending the night under this roof: but such I am most happy and thankful to say is the fact.

At 11 o'clock I left the ship, in the captain's gig, accompanied by Lieutenant Dornin, and Midshipmen Huntt and Wurts: Lieutenant Lardner, the Master, and Midshipmen Maury, going in the third cutter. A tremendous swell was setting towards the land, and it was almost as much as one's life was worth, to attempt getting into the boats, as they rose and fell, apparently ten or twelve feet, with every returning billow. We got off safely however, and as the sea did not break, did very well, with the exception of the long pull to the bottom of the bay. The ship was farther off the land than we thought—not less than eight or nine miles, and it was half past 12 o'clock, before we got into the harbor.

An immense thatched building, beautifully finished, on the western side of the bay, near the river of Wa-iruku, I rightly judged to be the chapel; and we steered for it, knowing that the mission house would be found near. While still a considerable distance from the beach, I recognized Mr. Goodrich among a crowd of natives, beckoning us to the best spot for landing. Shortly afterwards, our boat touched the Hawaiian shore—a thousand varied thoughts and emotions rushed upon my mind and heart, and I was incapable of lifting up my head, lest I should betray what might be interpreted into a weakness by my companions, till I found myself in the strong grasp of a missionary friend and brother. Our meeting was the more impressive and affecting to Mr. Goodrich, from its being entirely unexpected. He had had no further intimation of my proposed visit, than that of having heard of my appointment in the naval service, and of the possibility of my visiting the islands, at some future period.

After introducing my fellow-officers, a few minutes walk inland, brought us to the mission house, where I was happy to meet Mrs. Goodrich and two little daughters, in good health. Mr. Goodrich is at present without an associate.

The captain had felt it necessary to limit our stay on shore to half an hour; and consequently all was hurry and excitement—a hundred things to learn, a hundred things to tell, and a hundred things to see. After ascertaining that all the missionaries were well, every thing in a most promising and prosperous state, and a great deal else of gratifying intelligence, we took a turn in the garden, where there is much to admire in the variety and luxuriance of the productions of this part of the islands.

The location of the mission ground is much more eligible and delightful than when you were here in 1825; commanding fine views of the harbor, ocean, and surrounding shores, ornamented and shaded by clumps of the bread-fruit, and possessing a soil of almost unequalled richness. Every thing except the bread-fruit within the inclosure, is the growth of little more than two years. Yet, besides fine hedges of a native tree very similar in appearance to the mountain ash, of the ti—dracæna—damask rose, and cape gooseberry, there are many fine coffee plants, covered with berries of an uncommonly large size, exhibiting a vigor and rankness unequalled by any I saw at Rio de Janiero, a fine vineyard, with vines trained into arbors; tamarind, fig, lime, lemon, orange, and mango trees, strawberries, &c. &c. In the shrubbery, I observed the pride of Barbadoes—cæsalpinia coriaria—the seeds of which I believe I brought to the island, thriving finely; and by its rich blossoms of crimson and orange, imparting an air of gaiety to every thing near. The strawberry bed too, is from seeds sent to me, and received after our return to America.

The news of my arrival spread rapidly among the people; and the house soon began to be thronged with those, who had a recollection of me, but whom, principally, I had forgotten. Many of them shed tears, as they embraced and kissed my hands, or sank at my feet, manifesting a degree of sensibility and affection—considering their slight personal knowledge of me—that was surprising, till informed of the happy fact, that a period of deep seriousness and religious feeling has long existed at this place, and that many of these are still under the influence of the lively affections of recent conversion: of a conversion not only from the follies and sins of a worldly life, but from the ignorance, superstition, and prejudices of heathenism, to the love and services of true piety.

There were those in the number, however, whom you and I, not only know, but never can forget—particularly Bartimeus, our blind friend of Lahaina, and John Honorii. They both reside at this station, as assistants to Mr. Goodrich. Many and repeated kind inquiries from them and others were made concerning yourself and children: and “aroha ino rakou,” “great affection for them,” repeatedly burst from their lips.

Our limited half hour was gone before we seemed to have been fifteen minutes on shore: and we felt ourselves obliged even to decline the refreshments which Mrs. Goodrich had kindly prepared, and to take a hasty leave. The hope, that by some means, I might see them again, before the Vincennes should bid a final adieu to the islands, prevented the feeling that I was bidding them farewell; and I was therefore saved an unnecessary sorrow.

After a hard row of two hours, we gained the ship; and as soon as the boats were secured, stood away, as we thought, for Maui. But the wind had already become light and baffling. A heavy swell and current were setting us within the points forming the bay, and our prospects of making much progress for the night were very uncertain: so much so, that after a moment's debate, to my surprise, but equally to my satisfaction, the captain determined upon running into the harbor, before the land breeze should come off; and by spreading a mountain of light sail, we were gently fanned in; and by five o'clock were snugly at anchor abreast of the river and waterfall, and of course in the immediate vicinity of this place. Mr. Goodrich, perceiving our design, boarded us in his canoe, in time to point out the best anchorage for a vessel of our class.

As we entered the bay, the rays of the declining sun gleamed brightly over the wide extent of open campaign country, distinguishing this part of Hawaii from that of every other island in the Pacific I have yet visited—presenting its broad lawns and dark groves, in lights and shades of exquisite beauty, and in every variety of verdure, from that which seemed almost white to the deepest green.

From the lofty, but primitive looking chapel, as a centre, the humble dwelling of the fisherman and the farmer were seen, widely scattered in every direction; some skirting the beach, as it swept round in the beautiful curvature forming the bottom of the bay; some hanging on the cliffs of the bolder shores; some just peeping from the thick foliage of a grove more inland, or slightly screened by the shade of a small clump or single tree; and some, again, standing unsheltered and alone, in the midst of a wide spreading field. Such was the foreground; while behind, an extensive country, marked in two or three places by old, long extinguished, and now verdant craters—rose gradually for miles, to the stately forests enriching the broad bases of Mounaroa and Mounakea, both in distinct view—the first appearing far in the south, above and beyond a line of green forests, in one long, regular, and distant arch of blue—the last, seemingly near, towering loftily against the western sky, in irregular and broken summits of gigantic magnitude. The admiration of all on board was greatly excited by the scene. I thought, myself, I had scarce ever gazed on one of simple nature more rich and lovely: and we all rejoiced to be informed, from the captain, that being now at anchor, the Vincennes would remain at least a week or ten days, before proceeding to the leeward.

I early took leave of the ship, to spend the evening and night on shore, and kept my friends from their rest long beyond their accustomed hour.

As is almost invariably the case in this district, heavy showers of rain fell during the latter part of the night and morning, and every thing without became so perfectly drenched, that I was kept within doors till a late hour. I felt no disposition, however, to complain of the cause, for the pattering of the rain on the thatch of the roof and sides of the house, proved a lullaby so soothing, as to make my repose of the kind, that

LETTER III.

A WORSHIPING ASSEMBLY AT HIDO.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Byron's Bay, {
October 4th, 1829. }

THE scenes of the sabbath have been such, dear H——, that a review of them, in my own mind, will not be an abuse of sacred time—nor will their perusal give rise to thoughts and affections unsuited to a day of God.

At an early hour of the morning, even before we had taken our breakfast on board ship, a single islander here or there, or a group of three or four, wrapped in their large mantles of various hues, might be seen winding their way among the groves, fringing the bay on the east, or descending from the hills and ravine on the north, towards the chapel; and by degrees their numbers increased, till, in a short time, every path along the beach and over the uplands, presented an almost uninterrupted procession of both sexes and of every age, all pressing to the house of God. So few canoes were round the ship yesterday, and the landing place had been so little thronged, as our boats passed to and fro, that one might have thought the district but thinly inhabited; but now, such multitudes were seen gathering from various directions, that the exclamation, "What crowds of people! what crowds of people!" was heard from the quarter-deck to the fore-castle.

Even to myself, it was a sight of surprise: surprise not at the magnitude of the population, but that the object, for which they were evidently assembling, should bring together so great a multitude. And as my thoughts re-echoed the words "what crowds of people!" remembrances and affections of deep power came over me; and the silent musings of my heart were "what a change—what a happy change!" When at this very place, only four years ago, the known wishes and example of chiefs of high authority, the daily persuasion of teachers, added to motives of curiosity and novelty, could scarce induce a hundred of the inhabitants to give an irregular, careless, and impatient attendance on the services of the sanctuary. But now,

"Like mountain torrents pouring to the main,
From every glen a living stream came forth—
From every hill in crowds they hastened down,
To worship him, who deigns in humblest fane,
On wildest shore, to meet the upright in heart."

The scene, as looked on from our ship, in the stillness of a brightly beaming sabbath morning, was well calculated with its associations, to prepare the mind for strong impressions on a nearer view, when the conclusion of our own public worship should allow us to go on shore. Mr. Goodrich had apprised us, that he had found it expedient to hold the services of the sabbath, usually attended at all the other stations at nine o'clock in the morning, and at four in the afternoon, both in the forepart of the day, that all might have the benefit of two sermons, and still reach their abodes before nightfall. For,

————— "Numbers dwelt remote,
And first must traverse many a weary mile,
To reach the altar of the God they love."

And it was arranged, that, on this occasion, the second service should be postponed, till the officers should be at liberty to leave the ship. It was near 12 o'clock, when we went on shore ; the captain and 1st lieut., the purser, surgeon, several of the midshipmen and myself. Though the services had commenced when we landed, large numbers were seen circling the doors without, but as we afterwards found, only from the impracticability of obtaining places within. The house is an immense structure, capable of containing many thousands, every part of which was filled, except a small area in front of the pulpit, where seats were reserved for us, and to which we made our way, in slow and tedious procession, from the difficulty of finding a spot to place even our footsteps without treading on limbs of the people, seated on their feet, as closely almost, as they could be stowed.

As we entered, Mr. Goodrich paused in his sermon till we should be seated. I ascended the pulpit beside him, from which I had a full view of the congregation. The suspense of attention in the people was only momentary, notwithstanding the entire novelty to them of the laced coats, cocked hats, and other appendages of naval uniform. I can scarce describe the emotions experienced, in glancing an eye over the immense number, seated so thickly on the matted floor as to seem literally one mass of heads, covering an area of more than nine thousand square feet. The sight was most striking, and soon became, not only to myself, but to some of my fellow-officers, deeply affecting.

I have gazed on many worshiping assemblies, and of every variety of character, from those formed of the high and the princely—with a splendor and pageantry of train befitting the magnificence of the cathedrals in which they bowed—to the humblest “two or three” who ever came together at a place “where prayer is wont to be made.” I have listened with delighted attention to some of the highest eloquence, the pulpits of America and England of the present day can boast, and have watched with sympathetic excitement the effect produced by it, till all who heard were wrapt into an enthusiasm of high toned feeling, at the sublimity of the theme presented. I have seen tears of conviction and of penitence flow freely even to the seeming breaking of the heart, under the sterner truths of the word of God: and not unfrequently too, have witnessed, as the annunciation of “Peace—be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee,” has fallen on the soul, smiles of hope and joy, such as would adorn an angel’s brow, rapidly take their place. But it was left for a worshiping assembly at Hido, the most obscure corner of these distant islands, to excite the liveliest emotions ever experienced, and leave the deepest impressions of the extent and unsearchable riches of the gospel, which I have ever known—emotions and impressions derived simply from an ocular demonstration of the power of the word of God on untutored man, which is without a parallel in existing events, if not in the records of history.

It seemed, even while I gazed, that the majesty of that power might be seen rising and erecting to itself a throne, permanent as glorious, in the hearts of these, but late utterly benighted and deeply polluted people. And when I compared them, as they had once been known to me, and as they now appeared, the change seemed the effect of a mandate scarce less mighty in its power, or speedy in its result, than that exhibited when it was said "Let there be light!"—"and there was light!"

The depth of the impression arose from the irresistible conviction that the SPIRIT OF GOD was there: it could have been nothing else. With the exception of the inferior chiefs having charge of the district, and their dependants, of two or three native members of the church and of the mission family, scarce one of the whole multitude was in other than the native dress—the maro and the kihei—the simple garments of their primitive state. In this respect, and in the attitude of sitting, the assembly was purely pagan, totally unlike those of the Society Islands already described—as unlike as to one at home. But the breathless silence, the eager attention, the half suppressed sigh, the tear, the various feeling, sad, peaceful, joyous—discoverable in the faces of many—all spoke the presence of an invisible but omnipotent power, the power that can alone melt and renew the heart of man, even as it alone first brought it into existence.

It was, in a word, a heathen congregation laying hold on the hopes of eternity—a heathen congregation, fully sensible of the darkness and despair of their original state, exulting in the first beams of truth, and in the no uncertain dawning of the Sun of Righteousness: thirsting after knowledge, even while they sweetly drank of the waters of life; and under the reviving and inspiring influence, by every look, expressing the heartfelt truth—“Beautiful on the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings; that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth SALVATION!

From the thousands present, I might select many individuals whose appearance was such as to stamp these impressions indelibly on my heart. The aspect of one, at least, I can never forget: and will attempt to describe. It was a diminutive old woman, shrivelled by age till little more of her figure, with an appearance of health, was left, than skin and bone. The style of her features, however, was of the regular and more pleasing character found among the islanders, with an amiable and benignant expression, which, in connexion with an entirely whitened head, exacted from the observer a look of kindness in return. Folded in a large mantle of black tapa, she was leaning, when my eyes first fell upon her, against a pillar near the pulpit, beside which she was sitting, with her head inclined upwards and her eyes fixed upon the preacher. There was not only a seriousness, but a deep pensiveness in her whole aspect that riveted my attention: and as Mr. Goodrich proceeded in his discourse, a tear was seen occasionally to start in her eye, and more than one made their way down her deeply wrinkled cheeks, upon her mantle.

I had not, in my long absence, so entirely forgotten the native language, as not to understand much that was said. After some time, this sentence was uttered: "We are all sinners—but we have a God and Saviour, who will forgive us our sins, if we ask it of him. It is our duty to pray for this to God—and he hears the prayers of all who approach him in sincerity." I happened, at the moment, to look again upon this object—her attitude and aspect were the same, except that her lips moved in the evident and almost audible repetition of the sentence. She again repeated it, as if to be certain that she heard and understood it correctly; and, as she did so, a bright and peaceful smile spread over every feature—tears gushed rapidly from her eyes, and she hid her face in the folds of her garment. Could I be deceived in the interpretation of this case? Could I be mistaken in the causes and the nature of those varied emotions, under the circumstances in which they were beheld; and in one, of whom I had never heard, and whom I had never before seen? No, I could not: and if so—what is the language they speak? They plainly say that this poor woman, grown gray in the ignorance and varied degradation of heathenism, by "the lamp let down from heaven" sees herself to be a sinner, and is oppressed to sadness and to sighing under a sense of her guilt. But she hears of pardon and salvation, freely given, to all who will freely receive—hears of the glorious liberty of the gospel, and of all the rich privileges it confers, even to high access and intimate communion with the Father of spirits—hears and believes, and sinks before her God, in tears of gratitude and of joy!

The simple appearance and every deportment of that obscure congregation, whom I had once known, and at no remote period, only as a set of rude, licentious, and wild pagans, did more to rivet the conviction of the divine origin of the Bible, and of the holy influences by which it is accompanied to the hearts of men, than all the arguments, and apologies, and defences of Christianity I ever read.

Towards evening, Mr. Stribling and myself went again on shore, and remained till late, learning from our missionary friends the most gratifying intelligence, in corroboration of the opinion formed, in the morning, of the state of the people. An entire moral reformation has taken place in the vicinity of this station. Though latest established and long far behind others in success and interest, it bids fair, now, to be not a whit behind the very chiefest in its moral and religious achievements. Instruction of every kind is eagerly and universally sought; and only last week, not less than ten thousand people were assembled at an examination of schools. The mission-house is daily crowded with earnest inquirers in every right way; evil customs and atrocious vices are abandoned; a strict outward conformity to good morals observed ; and numbers, it is hoped and confidently believed, have yielded and are yielding themselves to all the sweet charities and pure affections of genuine piety. From many an humble dwelling, now

"Is daily heard
The voice of prayer and praise to Jacob's God :
And many a heart in secret heaves the sigh
To him who hears well pleased the sigh contrite.

Even in the hut of the child murderer,

"The father, with his offspring dear,
Now bends the knee to God and humbly asks
That he would bless them with a parent's love—
With heavenly manna feed their hungry souls
And on their hearts, as Hermon's dew, descend."

LETTER IV.

JOURNEY TO THE VOLCANO OF KIRAUEA, AND AN ACCOUNT OF ITS PRESENT STATE.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Byron's Bay, }
October 9th, 1829. }

THE planning of a trip to the Volcano at the base of the mountain Mounaroa, thirty-five miles inland from this harbor, was a first subject of attention, after being safely moored on Friday. A party, of which you will not be surprised to hear that I made one, was immediately formed ; and Maaro, the head man of the district engaged to furnish us with twenty stout men—of whom John Honorii was to be manager—to carry our provisions and luggage.

Accordingly, early on Monday morning, we were found, in all the bustle of a hasty preparation for the excursion; and, after a general overhauling of wardrobes for old hats, old coats, and old clothes of every description, except old shoes, exhibited, on mustering on the quarter-deck after breakfast, a party in costume as appropriate to a pedestrian journey at Hawaii, as at variance, with the prescribed dress of the service, on board ship. Our number was composed of lieutenants Dornin, Magruder, and Lardner, Purser Buchanan, the Surgeon, midshipmen Bissell, Huntt, Melville, Wurts, and myself, with one or two servants to take charge of various good things, in chest and basket, and to keep under appetites, occasionally disposed, even in ordinary circumstances, to be rebellious.

By nine o'clock, we were all stowed in the first cutter, which was to take us to Maaro's house, at the fish-ponds, to meet the men hired of him; and, shortly after, well pleased to be off, and full of high-toned spirits from the anticipated interest of our excursion, we waved farewell to those who, reluctantly, stayed behind

“And guard the ship from foe or wreck.”

We soon, however, met with a damper to our buoyancy, in a genuine Hido shower, which detained us a long time at Maaro's; and, by filling everything in our way with water, effectually rendered the precaution we had taken against the morning wetness of the grass and bushes, in determining not to start till after breakfast, of no avail. Before eleven o'clock, all again was brightness; and, after seeing our various luggage distributed among the islanders, we set off. The whole route is so minutely, and, from second observation, I can confidently add, so correctly described, in the published account of our residence in this nation, that, in place of repetition, with the privilege of an author, I will say, see "Stewart, on the Sandwich Islands."

We accomplished fourteen miles just after four o'clock; and finding excellent accommodations for the night, at that distance, determined to sleep before proceeding farther. The establishment—consisting of three houses, situated a short distance from the road, on the borders of a fine tract of land, having very much the appearance of a large plantation of intermingled arable and meadow grounds at home, and just at the edge of a fine forest running from the sea to the interior—belongs to Kinai, the head man of the thinly inhabited district of Ora. The master and his family were absent, some thirty or forty miles, superintending the cutting of sandal wood; and a few domestics only were at home, in charge of the houses. These, however, received us very kindly; and, at once, surrendered the principal habitation entirely to us—a kindness for which we were sufficiently fatigued to be truly thankful.

Here we were quickly made sensible, that the improvements and advancement of the people are not limited to the sea-ports or to the coast. The house was divided into separate rooms by screens of native cloth and mats, furnishing distinct sleeping places for the inmates, besides one large and airy apartment, evidently kept as a better and principal room. Into this last we were shown; and a fine saloon at an American hotel, had we been travelling where we could have commanded it, would not have been so great a luxury to us, as the neatness and evident comfort of this, under the circumstances in which we were.

The finer mats for the floor, were economically rolled up against one side of the house, to save them from injury in the absence of the chief; and other derangement of the ordinary articles of use, was observable from the same cause—so that we did not see the establishment in its best state. Still, everything testified, in my eyes, to a vast improvement in the style of living, even among the inferior chiefs. Among other evidences of advancement were the few books, yet printed in the native tongue, well bound and wrapped in covers of native cloth; and a large slate, suspended against one of the partitions.

But that which our party, in general, hailed with most pleasure, was a fine lounge or divan, eight or ten feet in width, extending the whole length of the apartment. It was composed of a great number of thicknesses of mats, on a platform of wood, elevated about two feet from the floor; and, surrounded by curtains of neat furniture chintz, afforded a couch for the whole of our number, which we might have coveted under circumstances of much less fatigue.

Indeed the comfort of the accommodations—a refreshing cup of tea and a substantial supper—the novelty of everything around—freedom from the confinement of the vessel, and with it, from the tedium of the night-watch, &c. &c., gave such a flow to the lively spirits of some of our younger companions, as to make it a late hour, before we were composed to quietude and to sleep.

Nothing of particular interest occurred the next day, till we had arrived in the immediate vicinity of the volcano. The smoke ascending from it was discerned at a much greater distance—ten or twelve miles—than on my former visit; and was so massive in its columns, as to promise a high state of action. I regretted to ascertain, that the only hut now standing, in which we could find shelter, was at a different place from that which we had occupied in 1825; and that, in going to it, we should approach the crater in a different, and less striking manner. I was wishing to have all my first impressions and emotions renewed: and, in the disappointment, almost lost the wildness and beauty of the more gradual descent of the precipices, which we were making, by a path which branched off from the old one, just as we were coming upon them. The nearness of night, and a threatening of rain, however, left me no alternative—and I hastened on with my companions, to catch a first view, under whatever advantages the new approach might offer.

Our arrival was more sudden than I had expected it to be. I had been looking for some more abrupt descent than any we had yet made, and was straining my eyes into the vast body of thick and heated smoke—rising high to heaven and spreading widely over the whole hemisphere to the south—for at least a glimpse of the tremendous gulf from whence it issued, when, scarce without warning, we found ourselves entering heavy currents of steam, rising rapidly from crevices and deep fissures about our path, and extending, at intervals, on one side, to the smoke from the crater, and on the other, to a low precipice, flanking our right. This, on turning towards it, was seen itself, in many places, even to its very top, to smoke like a coal-kiln. The whole surface of the level on which we were—a plain a mile in length and half a mile in breadth, inclosed on the edge of the crater by a sweep of the precipice—exhibited, in a greater or less degree, the same evidences of wide spread subterranean burnings.

The trade-wind blew freshly, and swept the dense steam and highly heated air, bursting from the ground, in strong currents and whirling eddies across our path; and, at the same time, bore before it above, a thick and gloomy scud from the sea, flying so low as to brush swiftly through the trees on the top of the precipice, and, at times, to be scarce above our heads. Everything wore a foreboding and saddening aspect: and, whatever I felt I had lost in a clear and distant view—like that enjoyed when with Lord Byron—the sight of the hut, which was to be our sleeping place, still far ahead, and, seemingly, in the midst of these admonitory signs of a dangerous substratum, gave rise to a sense of exposure, and to apprehensions, not experienced on the former occasion.

The rude lodge we were to occupy, open in front, and only slightly thatched on the side next the wind, stands two or three hundred yards from the edge of the crater on the north end, but does not command a view below ; we, therefore, scarce stopped at it, but with impatient eagerness, hurried to the brink. It was, however, only to meet with disappointment : the smoke, in the whole chasm, was so dense as to be utterly impenetrable—a flickering flame, here and there, was only occasionally to be seen through its thickness ; and, now and then, a sudden flash, sending an illuminated column high towards the summit. Still the sight was deeply impressive. It was evident that the perpendicular depth, from our very footsteps down, was tremendous, and seemingly unfathomable ; and the obscure outline of the upper edges, sweeping off on either hand till lost to the eye in the smoke, gave an impression of awful immensity, disposing one to shrink back from the proximity already ventured.

Another cause of disappointment, was the absence of those terrific noises, which on my first visit, were constantly bursting upon the ear : now scarce a sound was to be heard, except the rushing of the wind, as it swept over the edges of the cliffs, to the more rarified atmosphere within—unless it were an occasional indistinct sigh—a half smothered murmur or wheeze—and now and then, as a lull or eddy of the wind rendered the hearing from that direction more distinct, the hiss of escaping steam, and something like the simmer and the bubbling of a mighty cauldron, mingled with the distant sound of a surf, rolling on a pebbly beach.

There was in this assemblage of images—in the lowery sky and driving wind—in the riven and steaming ground—in the heavy masses of smoke rising from the hedious chasm beneath, as if from a bottomless pit—and in the oppressive and saddening sounds occasionally coming to the ear—that, which was well suited to the recollection of years gone by, and of friends afar, who had once shared with me in the enthusiasm of high wrought admiration, excited by the same object. And, in the indulgence of thus induced by circumstances and by scene, I lingered on the brink till completely chilled, by the increasing freshness and dampness of the breeze.

The rude hut, or rather screen against the wind—consisting of poles propt in a slanting position, and covered on one side only with a few leaves of the sugar cane, and bushes slightly placed upon them—we thought for a time very comfortable, and wisely located as to temperature ; being on a spot of ground of such grateful heat, compared with the rawness of the mountain air, as to lead us to congratulate ourselves in the advantage it afforded, as we sat on our various packages in front, and partook of our evening repast, within a foot of a crevice, from which steam issued of such power as to cook our potatoes, in a short time, without the aid of fire. But when we came to take possession of the mats, strewn inside of it for beds, we found ourselves in quarters considerably hotter than those, in which, Coleman the poet puts his lodger over the bake shop. You will scarce believe, that we all slept on a temperature of 120° Fahrenheit—but such is the fact : and it was well the air above was as low as 56° or 60°, so that by frequent turnings, we could let one side cool, while the other was cooking, or we should have been well-nigh parboiled by morning. There was no alternate however—it was the only shelter—and as there were dashes of rain through the night, it would have been almost death to have slept, in the open air, on any cooler bed. We, therefore, made the best of the necessity ; and after many a twist and toss of restlessness, an occasional groan of impatience, and not a few forebodings, from one part of our bower or another, that we should be steamed to skeletons before morning, we made out a tolerable night's rest ; and were quite in good humour with our dormitory, to find, on rising, that the continued vapor bath had dissipated, almost entirely, the stiffness of limb which most of us had suffered, from the length and rapidity of our walk.

I rose at midnight, and went to the crater. The steam from above was still driving, in thick volumes, over the cliffs ; and with the smoke from below, rendered every thing obscure ; but various seats of fire, in tremendous action, sent up flashes of light through the dimness, to the highest clouds, and, at times, converted the whole body of smoke into one lurid mass. Some of the spots, apparently most liquid and most agitated, were immediately below the place where I stood ; and, now and then, fiery streams in them, circling widely and swiftly in different directions, glared on the eye, in all the regularity and brilliancy of the lamps of an orchestra. But as these exhibitions were but fitful and obscure, compared with what I had on a former occasion beheld, and the wind bleak and piercing, I was glad to make a hasty and shivering return, to the warmth of my couch.

The morning was bright and beautiful, affording us—with a sky as purely blue as any ever looked on—splendid views in purple of Mounaroa, seemingly close at hand, and of Mounakea far behind us in the distance. I was at the crater again, before sunrise; and followed its brink a half mile and more westward, with an opportunity of distinguishing, for the first time, its characteristic features. But the light of the day had extinguished the fires—where, in the night, the principal action, had been, nothing could now be discerned but smoking lakes, or black cones, tipped with pale, sulphureous flames.

Having reached the spot, where the low precipice inclosing the level on which the hut stands terminates at the crater, I took a path crossing it towards the forests, lying between the volcano and Mounaroa. Mr. Magruder and Mr. Lardner had gone in the same direction with their fowling pieces, in search of wild ducks, for a more sumptuous dinner than we could otherwise command. I joined them; and on the way, we fed luxuriously on the whortleberries of Pelè—which covered the whole surface of the ground, in rich clusters of the finest size, dripping with the rain of the night—not knowing how much more delicate a repast there was in reserve for us, beyond the rising ground over which we were walking, in an abundance of delightful strawberries.

These are found, principally, in an open meadow-like place, skirting a wood of noble trees of the eugenia and acacia.

In returning, we passed by the pools, furnishing visitors with the only water in the vicinity. Its preparation is a kind provision, not only for the weary traveller, as he occasionally crosses the island at this wonderful place, but for the fowls of the air, who, at most times, find security in the regions around—I say preparation, for the provision, though natural, is strictly such; and one of the most singular in the world. It is by the condensation of steam, escaping from holes and crevices in the ground, immediately to the windward of a bed of earth and lava so hard and compact, as to be impervious to water, and into excavations and natural basins, of which the drops, formed by the effect of the cold wind upon the vapor, fall, and furnish a constant supply of the purest water. I looked with admiration, on the simple process ever taking place, and thought with wonder and gratitude of the wisdom and goodness of the Almighty, often displayed in the economy of nature, in which circumstances seemingly small and unimportant, are not only highly conducive to the comfort, but vitally essential to the well being of his creatures. Well indeed may it be said, that “HIS WORKS DO PRAISE HIM.”

Soon after breakfast we began to prepare for a descent below; and, before long, were all marshalled and equipt with long canes, water flasks, &c., for the undertaking. Directly in front of our sleeping place, and entirely round the western side, the descent to the ledge, or offset, is a perpendicular wall of nine hundred feet ; we, therefore, went some quarter or half mile to the east, by the direction of our attendants, many of whom had, within the last two or three years, been here with several successive parties. On coming to the path leading down, I was quite surprised to find the commencement of it so different from that of my former descent. Indeed, I did not know, till then, that any part within the upper circumference, presented such an aspect—at a single view, affording the most conclusive proof of the kind of process going on, in the undermining of the surrounding mountain ; and of the manner in which the enormous fires beneath are fed, when old masses of matter upon which they have been acting, become utterly reduced to scoria and ashes.

After an almost perpendicular descent of eighty or a hundred feet, in accomplishing which, we, at times, hung from rock to rock,—the path came upon an extent of ground, half a mile in length and a quarter broad, broken into abrupt hills and deep glens, and covered with grass, shrubbery, and small trees. The whole declines gradually, several hundred feet, towards the crater, and constitutes a little valley, separated from it, by a succession of barren hills, of volcanic rock and sand. It had evidently been shattered into its present forms, and sunk from the level above, at no very remote period, in some convulsion, after its foundations had been sapped by the element still raging beneath. And it is not improbable, that, even now, the whole is suspended on some comparatively slender base, till another three shall open for it a descent into a fiery abyss, to be converted, in its turn, into a mass of liquid fire.

The scenery, here, was strikingly unique and romantic; consisting, above and behind us, of the bare and perpendicular face of rocks, from which this section had been rent as it came down; and of a succession of miniature mountains and ravines, thrown in to every wild form, and still beautifully verdant with various growth. The path winding over and through these—though plain and seemingly safe—is in truth, the most dangerous that I have met, in the whole region. In many places, the bushes and grass skirting it, either partially or entirely conceal, the most horrible pits and fissures, into which, almost without knowing it, a single false step, or a slip, might plunge one to be heard of no more. In several instances, when least dreaming of danger, I have come upon some of these, with a suddenness and want of caution, that have made my blood curdle, as I ventured a gaze, into their yawning and unfathomable mouths. Once, in particular, the first intimation I had of being near any thing of the kind, was the heat against my face, of the steam issuing from it; my feet being already on the very brink; it was sufficiently large to admit the stoutest man entire; of a depth to which the eye could not reach; and filled with vapor scalding hot! To have fallen into it must have been instant and irrecoverable destruction. In another place the path led over a crack—to all appearance without bottom, several feet in width, and extending on either hand as far as we could distinguish—by a single narrow arch of a foot's breadth only, in the manner of a natural bridge, from which to have stepped, would have been for eternity !

After traversing this singularly located glen, we found ourselves still four or five hundred feet above the ledge, within the crater : and the descent to it, very abrupt and difficult, from the hardness and smoothness of the lava of which chiefly it is constituted. In many places, large streams of no very ancient date—since they cooled and hardened in their running form—marked the sides of the cliff ; and by a principal one of these, resembling a cascade still pouring down the face of the hill, most of our party, in slow and necessarily cautious progress, reached the offset, or natural gallery, running round the chasm.

Here the changes that have taken place since 1825, first became striking. The general features were much the same ; but almost every spot, when looked upon in detail, shows evidence of new and tremendous action of fire, and of convulsion after convulsion, that must have shaken every thing far and wide. The greatest alteration, however, is that of which I had been apprised—the filling up of the whole surface below the ledge, at least two hundred feet. The depth below this, was estimated by Lord Byron's party, at five hundred feet—at present it cannot, on an average, be more than two hundred. Many of the highest of the cones have, thus, been much reduced in their loftiness ; and many have entirely disappeared. In all other respects, the general surface and aspect is the same : though there is much more fire in the north end than formerly, and the very route we took, in crossing the bottom at that time, is now a chain of liquid lakes, from one side to the other.

My first walk on the ledge was westward—the same direction I went when with Lord Byron—but I had not proceeded half the length of the northern side, before the way was interrupted by a sulphur cone, which has risen on the ledge ; and which was surrounded by such a suffocating vapor, as to prevent passing. I therefore returned to my companions, who were busily employed, in gathering curious specimens of a variety of kinds, till I should return to accompany them down the remaining distance to the bottom.

By the rising of the lava, the difficulty of making the descent is, in a great degree, done away in those places where it was ever practicable ; and it occupied but a few moments to go down. The surface is more broken and distorted than ever ; and presents a truly hideous mass of ruins. There being much more fire at the north end, than in 1825, the currents of heated and gaseous air, are more numerous, and more strongly impregnated ; and, consequently, an examination more hazardous. Our number became divided into separate parties—one of which went far into the middle of the northern section, and believe themselves to have been at the very edge of the largest lake, seen in powerful action the night before. The specimens of sulphur, collected from its border, are of the finest and most beautiful kind, but so recently formed and so delicate, as to be very difficult of preservation.

In the course of the two or three hours, we were at the bottom, we visited four cones—all the centres of great activity in the fires. The first was almost encrusted with sulphur; and could be approached only on the windward side, from the heat and suffocating vapor in every other direction. This was only a few feet high; and we got near enough to touch the sides and top with our canes. Though smoke and steam were projecting from its top with great force, and considerable noise, we perceived no flame or liquid lava: but the roaring of mighty fires below were distinctly heard; and, at a nearness, that marked with temerity the adventure, that brought us within the hearing of its undulating, and deeply menacing sounds.

The eager curiosity, however, which rendered us in a degree insensible to the hazards of our situation, was afterwards more completely gratified, in a visit to two others, much more lofty and unique, and altogether more imposing in their state and aspect. They were situated a mile farther south, along the eastern side; and our attention was called to them by the loud hissing and laborious action of steam, and by the flames which, occasionally, flashed from their summits. They were in the neighborhood of each other—each about twenty feet in height, not more than sixty in circumference at the base, and tapering almost to a point at the top—being in fact two immense, hollow columns, formed by successive slight overflowings of lava, cooling as it rolled down, into irregular flutings, ornamented with rude drops and pendants, and long, tapering stalactites.

The nearness of our approach, and the examination of these were greatly exciting. Though the ragings beneath must have been intense—from the tremendous roar within, the irresistible force and deafening hiss, with which the steam rushed from every opening, and from the flames which flashed up, followed by lava white with an intensity of heat—still the incrustation of scoria immediately around, seemed firm, and was less hot, than in many other places: admitting, not only of our coming close to the sides of the cone, but also of clambering some feet up them, till we could run our canes into the orifices at the top, and withdraw, with their burning ends, red hot lava, on which we readily made impressions, with pencil cases and naval buttons.

Pelé did not seem well pleased with this familiarity, however—even the slightest touch with our sticks against the molten lava, produced an increased rush and roar from below, with an angry spitting of the fiery matter high in the air around us; and, more than once, we retreated hastily to a more respectful distance, anticipating from the ill-natured mutterings and menacing struggles of her ladyship, to see a burning stream roll forth to put an effectual barrier to such close inspection.

So much of novelty—so much of fearful sublimity attracts the attention and calls for admiration, on every side, that day after day, in place of a single morning, would be insufficient to exhaust the points of interest in this grand object: and we regretted the necessity, that hunger, thirst, and fatigue imposed upon us, of taking leave of the depths to which we had descended.

The ascent to our cabin, by the same path we came, was toilsome in the extreme; and but for the refreshment derived from the whortle-berries—after having surmounted the first cliffs—we should have been almost entirely overcome.

The first evening of our arrival from the bay, while standing on the edge of the crater, a sudden blast of wind brushed from my head a Leghorn hat, which I had worn to shield my face, by its broad rim, from the sun; and in an instant swept it out of sight over the precipice, as was then supposed, beyond all recovery. But, while at dinner, after having reached the hut, we were alarmed by the running of one of the natives from the crater, calling, in great agitation, for a rope, which had been used in lashing our provision chest; and on hastily demanding what was the matter, learned, that an islander, when below in the morning, had caught a glimpse of it, lodged on the face of the precipice over which it had been blown, some hundred or more feet below the summit; and, that on coming up, he had gone over the brink, and by a most frightful effort, had succeeded in gaining possession of it. After making his way back, however, till within some twenty or thirty feet of the top, he found it impossible to get farther; and was then standing on a single projecting stone, in danger every moment of losing his hold, and of being precipitated to instant destruction, down a wall-faced cliff of at least nine hundred feet!

We shuddered at the bare thought of what the catastrophe might be—but seeing a sufficient number of the natives collected, to render any assistance practicable, we waited the event, in silent agitation; not wishing to be exposed to the possibility of witnessing with our eyes, what might be too horrid to relate. In a few moments we had the happiness to perceive, from the general movement and appearance of his companions, that the attempt at rescue had been successful; and, shortly after, pale as death—trembling like an aspen leaf—and covered with a cold sweat, he came and laid the old Leghorn at my feet!

The hat was not worth a moment of anxiety, much less the exposure undergone; and, while I rewarded the intrepidity of the young man, I felt disposed to reprove the daring rashness that led to the exhibition of it. None but the kindest and most disinterested motives induced the attempt—a principal one, doubtless, being that of seeing me under the necessity of resorting to a turban of silk handkerchiefs, to shield my head from a noonday sun—and though alarming in its possible consequences, the motive merited commendation and grateful acknowledgment.

The remainder of the day was almost necessarily, from the exhaustion of the morning, given to lounging and repose. As the darkness of the night closed around us, however, we took a station in sight of the crater, and, wrapped in our cloaks, sat in the fresh wind on the precipice for an hour or more, catching occasionally through the smoke, exhibitions of great beauty and sublimity. But there were none to prevent a feeling of disappointed expectation, on my part, in comparison with the high gratification before derived from the same object: and I returned to our lodge with my companions, thinking that I must remain indebted to my first visit, for the sublimest impressions ever made on my mind and feelings, by a work of nature.

In this, however, I was mistaken. After some hours of sound sleep, I awoke; and perceiving the smoke and clouds over the volcano to be splendidly illuminated, hastened with a glass to a point of observation. A very sensible change had taken place in the liveliness of the seats of fire—in the vividness of the flashings of light—and in the sharpness and force of the sounds from various parts. I had been seated about ten minutes, fixing the field of the telescope on one and another of the cones, and on the lakes and rivers of bright lava, with great delight, when a sudden hissing and mingling of confused sounds, accompanied by a brilliant glare of flames almost directly beneath me, attracted my attention, and led me to direct the glass to the spot. In doing this, I was presented with a spectacle, which, even imagination itself can scarce rival.

The power of the glass was such as to bring the scene, seemingly, within touching distance; and to make me involuntarily recoil, from the apparent proximity to which I was brought by it. A lake, a half mile or more in circumference—and probably but just unclosed—was raging in all the tumult of a tempest at sea. At first, the agitation was perpendicular.

cular—precisely that of a boiling cauldron—tossing up masses of the red-hot matter, in a bubbling action, fifteen and twenty feet, with a rapidity of motion, equal to that of the most heated boiler. Then came a long, regular motion from the south, heaving before it a fiery surf, whose billows rose, and crested, and broke, in sheets and spray of fire, like heavy billows sweeping over a reef to the shore! The effect was almost too fearful to be gazed on; and, for a moment—in forgetfulness of the distance and safety of my location—as billow after billow rose higher and higher and seemed ready to dash over me, with an exclamation of horror, I dropped the glass and closed my eyes upon the sight.

I would have run for my fellow-travellers, but feared, that before they could be roused and would reach the spot, the aspect of the scene might be entirely altered. This indeed would have been the case; for, in less than fifteen minutes, the agitation had entirely ceased; and the surface soon became less bright and fiery than that of many other spots. I waited a long time, hoping to see it renewed, but in vain: and then returned to my couch under an excitement of varied emotion, admiration, awe, and deep humility, before the majesty and power of the Almighty in his works, never before experienced; and repaid a hundred fold, by the scene, for all the fatigue and exposure of the journey.

In the nearness and distinctness of the view, and in the clear perception of the form, character, and power of the action, it far surpassed any thing beheld on the nights I was there with Lord Byron—though the general exhibitions, at that period, were far more beautiful, and less obscured by smoke, than during this visit.

Early on Thursday morning, our encampment was in the bustle of preparation for a return to the bay: and breakfast was finished, and our long procession formed, by half past six o'clock. The weather did not promise much in our favor. The clouds were low and scudding—every thing wore rather a gloomy aspect—and we had scarce accomplished three miles, before it began to rain; and in a short time, we found ourselves in a perfect storm. There was no alternative, however, but as rapid a march as possible. With stiffened and swollen limbs and feet, shoes very much the worse for service already performed, stores nearly expended, a driving rain in our faces, and a walk of twenty miles to accomplish before we could reach a shelter, we did not feel much disposed to be facetious; and formed rather a silent and wo-begone procession, compared with the buoyancy, with which we had hurried over the same ground, two days before.

Each one seemed to think, that the sooner he brought his own precious body under cover, the better; and we made short work, to the residence of Kinai, the petty chieftain of Ora. We were there by 12 o'clock; and found his establishment tenfold more welcome than before. All of us were drenched with rain, and in a state greatly to relish the luxury of a large fire, and a change of clothes, which our portmanteaus still fortunately afforded. We should have remained here all night, had there been no rain; and therefore, the storm instead of being an annoyance, rather added to the cheerfulness of our spirits, when screened from its power.

We were off early again in the morning; and after a very fatiguing walk, from the wetness of the path, and the excessively bad state in which we found the road through the wood, reached Maaro's about noon. An express had been sent ahead, with information of our approach, and a request for a boat to be in waiting for us—so that we were safely on board the Vincennes in time for a dinner, for which we had long felt well-set appetites. Thus, dear H—, you have the outline of a second excursion to the habitation of PELE.

LETTER V.

CASCADE OF THE RAINBOW.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Byron's Bay, }

WE were to have sailed for Oahu, at 4 o'clock this morning; but before our anchors were up, the land breeze died away, and it became necessary to drop them again. All hands were kept on board till after dinner, in the hope that we might still be able to get out of the harbor: but then, there being little prospect of this for the day, Captain Finch allowed a party to go on shore, to be recalled in case of a change of wind, by the firing of a gun, and the hoisting of a flag at the foremast head.

I did not regret the detention. There is one object worthy of notice, in the vicinity of the bay, which I had not previously an opportunity of visiting—a waterfall in the Wairuku, two or three miles above its mouth, called by the natives, "ke Wai Anue nue," "the Cascade of the Rainbow," from the beautiful exhibition of that phenomenon, on the spray created by it, whenever the sun is unshaded.

Mr. Goodrich had dined with us; and became the guide to this spot of a party, consisting of Lieutenant Stribling, Midshipmen Irving, Smith, Rowan, Maury, Taylor, Anthony, and myself. We landed at the mouth of the Wairuku, on the wild rocks forming its precipitous banks. This place has been a favorite resort of our gentlemen; and the untiring feats of the islanders, in throwing themselves from some of the highest of the adjoining cliffs—thirty, forty, and fifty feet—into the basins below; and in gliding down the falls above the watering-place, at the seeming hazard of being dashed to death, have daily afforded them great amusement.

The path to the curiosity we intended visiting, led us along the top of the high banks and precipices edging the ravine, through which the Wairuku—by a gradually descending and winding course—rumbles and foams over its rocky bed, from the mountains fifteen or twenty miles inland, to the bay. A bright and beautiful afternoon, after a clouded and dull morning, added to the unexpected pleasure of another ramble over these verdant and truly charming shores, and the gratifying thought of leaving nothing of interest in the immediate neighborhood unseen, imparted great vivacity to our company. I scarce know when I have more enjoyed the freshness of the land, the beauty of grass and flower, the twittering of the birds, and the babblings of the mountain stream, with varied other sources of delight both to the eye and to the ear, connected with the landscape around, than on this occasion.

When a mile on our way, we heard the pouring of a waterfall; and soon came in sight of one, extending like a mill-dam, in an unbroken ledge across the stream. It is some sixteen or twenty feet in height, and very similar in its general character, to one or two of the most admired sections of the range of cascades, forming the falls of the Canada creek, at Trenton in the state of New York.

In many places the bed of the river is deep—apparently unfathomable; and at such parts especially, the embankments are bold and abrupt—forty, sixty, and a hundred feet high—and generally perpendicular. One of the loftiest and most precipitous, just below the cascade to which we were going, was regarded by us with particular interest, as designating the scene of one of those tragic casualties, which, unhappily, have thrown a melancholy, though perhaps not unprofitable association, over two or three of the most celebrated resorts, of a similar kind, in our own country.

Not long since, a young female, with some of her companions, strolled up the banks of the river, to gather flowers for the wreaths worn as ornaments of the head and neck. On reaching this spot, a splendid cluster of the crimson blossoms of the ohia leihua—a species of eugenia—caught her eye, on the branch of a tree hanging over the precipice. Poising herself against a limb which she thought secure, she stretched her hand after the flower ; when—in the act of seizing it—her support suddenly gave way, and she was plunged to instant death, in the whirling eddies of the gulf below ! The young tree, flourishing gaily in the splendor of its dark green foliage and rich blossoms, still marks the fatal locality ; and, as long as it remains, will doubtless recall to the islanders, the doom of the youthful victim of vanity.

The principal object of our ramble surpassed, in novelty and beauty, every anticipation. It is decidedly superior, in the variety of its points of interest, to any other of the kind I have ever seen. It is also strikingly unique. The projection of water is one hundred and ten feet in height ; and the offset, causing it, in the view had of it from below, strictly a natural bridge, spanning the basin, into which the water is poured, in one broad arch, resting on either side upon massive abutments of basaltic rock. The arch, however, instead of being open entirely through, is the entrance of a deep recess or cavern, into the darkness and gloom of which the sight can scarce penetrate.

The basin beneath—a perfect circle of some hundred yards diameter—is as placid as a lake, except where the stream plunges into it from above, and completely walled in, save at a single narrow outlet, by precipices of rock a hundred and fifty feet or more high, richly covered with moss, fern, and shrubbery. An insulated, pyramidal peak, at the base of which we stood, rises directly opposite to the cascade; its formation, like that of the arch, being almost precisely that of the Giant's Causeway—possessing the same distinctive characteristics in form, and in regularity of arrangement.

There was something so secluded in the location, so wild in the outline, so rich and beautiful in the foliage and clothing of the cliffs, and in the mantling of their summits, so imposing in the rushing of the stream—as it poured itself in a silvered mass, directly, as it were, from the blue bosom of the sky, and then plunged, in equal splendor, into the depths below—that we were irresistibly charmed with the whole scene; and greatly regretted, that we should not have an opportunity of revisiting it for a day, in addition to the single hour we could now remain.

There is another waterfall in the Wairuku, still farther inland, which, Mr. Goodrich thinks, cannot be less than three hundred feet in height. Indeed, the numerous streams furrowing this section of Hawaii, from the mountains to the shore, are filled with them; and the whole may appropriately be styled “the region of cascades.”

We returned to the bay, by a different path, from that by which we went up. It led us directly to a range of three old craters, in the rear of the mission house, and half a mile from it. The highest and largest is that next the bay; and, when viewed from the water, partially conceals the others. Its trun-cated summit, a half mile in circumference, rises three or four hundred feet above the adjoining ground ; and is now, in every part, perfectly covered with turf. The sides of the rims next the sea, are in all of them the lowest ; and show plainly, that when in action, they disgorged themselves in that direction. Mr. Goodrich has encircled the largest, with a broad, deep ditch ; and converted it into a pasturage for his cattle, and for the horses of some of the chiefs, which have been sent to Hido for keeping.

The tops of the craters command fine views of the surrounding country ; especially of the bay, in its entire outline—from the blue and peaceful waters of which, the Vincennes was now seen to rise, loftily and beautifully, with her long pennant and broad banner gleaming brightly, in the setting sun.

THE HEREDITARY AND LAST PRIESTESS OF PELE.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Byron's Bay, }
October 12th, 1829. }

ON our return from the cascade of the Rainbow, Mr. Stribling and myself called at the mission house, and were, unexpectedly, gratified by an interview with the hereditary and last PRIESTESS OF PELE.

In speaking of the volcano, Mr. Goodrich incidentally remarked, that this individual was now residing in the immediate neighborhood ; and, at our suggestion, sent a messenger to invite her over. She almost immediately came, attended by her household, consisting of eight or ten individuals, male and female. I should judge her to be forty or forty-five years of age; a tall, finely formed, majestic woman, wrapped in a large, black mantle of native cloth, falling in thick folds like the Roman toga, from the bust to the ground. We were much impressed with her appearance, as she entered at the head of her train, and, after receiving our salutations, became seated on a mat in the centre of the apartment, in the attitude of a Turkish female on a divan. The style of her face is remarkably noble and commanding—indicative of strong traits of character—with a full, piercing black eye, which I can readily imagine, might be fearfully intimidating to the superstitious, when flashing in the wildness of an imaginary inspiration. There was not only a deep seriousness, but a decided cast of melancholy in her whole aspect, which reminded me, in connection with the strongly marked and superior contour of her features, of a fine print of the tragic muse, which I recollect to have seen.

Perhaps the impression on my mind was deepened, by the recollection of a rencontre, when a resident of Lahaina, with an inferior priestess of the same order, then still holding, or claiming the prerogatives of her class. I unexpectedly met her in an evening walk, followed by a considerable company; some, evidently under the influence of a superstitious feeling in reference to her; and others, as evidently disposed to deride her pretensions. She was dressed in a fantastic manner, with dishevelled hair—her eyes flashing in a half-frenzy, from the degree of excitement to which she had wrought herself—and appeared altogether like a maniac: such as I supposed her in reality to be, till undeceived by the exclamations of the crowd, “it is a goddess—it is a goddess!”

As if to intimidate, she approached me with a fierce and daring look; and waving before her a small flag of tapa, appended to a light staff, supported the claim by the declaration, “I am a goddess—a goddess indeed!—the palapala and the pule (letters and religion) are not good: they will destroy the people!” Until then, I was passing without intending to take further notice of her; but, understanding this—in view of the respective causes thus brought forward by her—as a kind of challenge, I stopped; and deliberating, for a moment, what course to pursue, fixed my eyes fully on hers, and charged her with falsehood and wickedness, in her attempts to deceive the people, by proclaiming herself a goddess, while conscious that she was an impostor, and that her pretensions to inspiration were a “mea puni-puni wale no,”—“a thing of falsehood only.” I spoke in a serious and positive tone, and my words had the effect designed. She could not meet the fixedness of my gaze; her eyes wavered and dropt; and becoming greatly embarrassed, she endeavored to turn the whole into a laugh; but I continued my reproof, till she hurried silently away, followed by the hootings and ridicule of the whole throng.

This individual was of small figure, and not of striking face, except in the brilliancy and power of a fine eye ; yet, in the fit of enthusiasm in which she at first appeared, there was an expression so unnatural, as to be fearful, even to the mind superior to superstitious emotions ; and which, irresistibly, reminded me of what I have imagined the looks of a demoniac to have been, in the times, when such possessions were, for wise purposes, permitted.

A lively recollection of the impressions of this incident, connected with the disadvantage in person and feature in the case, compared with the individual now present, enabled me easily to conceive, how fully this chief priestess, from the strength of expression and action of which her face and figure are evidently capable—under the excitement of a supposed inspiration by the goddess whose altar she served, while her might infuse, into a credulous votary, impressions and fears, that would readily be attributed to the power and agency of a supernatural being.

Should glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven,”—

It was by exhibitions of this kind, and the effect produced by them on the populace, that the priests and priestesses, especially those of Pelé, or the goddess of volcanoes, continued their sway over the belief and superstitious feelings of the people.

The priestess is now a firm believer in Christianity, and is one of the most attentive pupils of the station, at which, entirely for the benefit of instruction, she has become permanently established. Her convictions of the folly and wickedness of her former vocation is such, that she is reluctant to converse much upon it. Her father was the hereditary kahu, or steward, as she was the priestess, of Pelé. The duty of the kahu was to provide the materials for the general sacrifices—the food and raiment of the supposititious deity: to grow the taro, potatoes, and sugar-cane, and the cloth-plant, from which the garments for her were made; to provide the hogs and fowls, &c., and to have all things in readiness for the offerings, at the appointed seasons.

Of the plantations sacred to this use, one was on the seashore, and another within the precincts of the crater—in the broken ground, described as that upon which we first came, in descending from our hut, on our late visit. The kapu and his family resided, part of the time, on the coast; and part, in the neighborhood of the crater.

At the time of sacrifice, the priestess herself descended into the depths of the volcano, and, approaching the place most accessible and most active with fire, cast upon it the gifts, with the exclamation "Here Pelé is food for you"—specifying the article or articles—"and here is cloth," mentioning its name and varieties. In answer to the question, whether she was not afraid of the fire which she approached? she said no, for she then believed, that the goddess would defend her from harm—but, that now, when she knew, that there was no such being as Pelé, she should be afraid to go to places where she

Such, dear H——, have been the rapid and happy triumphs of Christianity, over the but lately deep-rooted heathenism of this country—and thus, have the shades of superstition and error been dispersed by the mild light of the gospel! Even those who have grown old in the performance of the most favorite rites of idolatry, and who held unbounded influence and distinguished rank from their office, have discarded the whole system; and, conscious of their ignorance and their guilt, are found meekly sitting at the feet of the High Priest of Salvation, to be instructed and redeemed by him!

The inhabitants of this section of Hawaii, as I have before remarked, are among the most primitive and rude of the islanders, still, they are no longer a pagan population, but, from every observation that our ship's company have been able to make, strictly and most conspicuously a Christian people. The description I have given of a sabbath here, will convey some idea of the manner, in which that and other external observances of Christianity are regarded. To it I may add, what I then omitted, that not a canoe—unless it might have been some one or two bringing their proprietors to church—was seen upon the water, nor a single instance observed of labor or amusement. Forty of our crew had liberty on shore on the afternoon of that day; and the report I overheard one and another of them giving to their fellows, was in itself sufficient to satisfy me of the utter change which had been accomplished, in the whole character of the people. So punctilious were the inhabitants, in their regard for the sabbath, that the seamen sought in vain to purchase any thing whatever. Not even a watermelon or a banana could be obtained, except as a gift of hospitality. No rude crowd gathered round, as they sauntered from place to place. The men treated them with civility when they came to their houses ; but the women, universally, with such distance, by withdrawing from the places where they were, and by seeking security in the bosoms of their families, from any familiarity that might have been offered, that no one, so far as I can learn, has it in his power to report, that he met with a single instance of licentiousness at Byron's Bay.

The force of this evidence of reformation, will be best understood by those, who have known what the character of the intercourse of shipping with its inhabitants, as well as those of every other part of the Sandwich Islands—even within a few years—has been ; and, by such, it will be acknowledged as one, which the most sanguine believers in the success of the mission, never expected to find, so early as the year 1829.

Along the whole coast, no noisy drum of heathenish carousal, nor rude song of obscenity is now heard—but in their place, the hum of the crowded school, the voice of thanksgiving and prayer, and, not unfrequently, the chanting of the morning and the evening hymn !

FIRST INTERVIEW WITH THE MISSIONARIES AT OAHU.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Roads of Honolulu, }
October 13th, 1829. }

YESTERDAY morning at four o'clock, we weighed anchor in Byron's Bay, and, after being gently fanned from the harbor by a land-breeze, took the trade-wind, and with all sail set, bore away for Oahu, some two hundred miles distant.

We made the eastern end of Maui, sometime before dark ; while the higher parts of Mounakea were still distinctly in sight, and—from their loftiness and the rich, deep blue of their shades—seemingly still near. Most of our gentlemen have felt disposed to question the estimate, that has generally been made, of the loftiness of this mountain ; but, as we left it yesterday, the more distant we became from it, the more evident it was to all, that, whether 18,000 feet or not above the level of the sea, it must be, and is, immensely high.

Just now we are favored with a beautiful moon ; and the officer of the mid-watch informed me this morning, that the view of the windward side of Maui was so distinct and fine, for two or three hours before daylight, that he thought seriously of calling me on deck to enjoy it. I went up at six o'clock. We were then far past the channel separating it from Morokai, and were rapidly approaching that between this latter island and Oahu. At seven o'clock, when off the north end of Morokai, we descried one of the headlands of Oahu in the neighborhood of Diamond Hill, rising dimly, like a conical islet, from the water.

Our approach after this was very rapid; and, in the course of a couple of hours, the whole of the eastern side came in view. As we drew in with the land, so as to distinguish the objects on shore, we were all greatly disappointed in its appearance—more so, no doubt, from having so recently left the luxuriance and verdure of Hido. Instead of the freshness and beauty of aspect exhibited, when first seen by us in 1823, it looked as if seared with fire; and in place of green hills and rich vallies, every part, except the very tops of the mountains, was of a dead ash color—and seemingly just swept, by a siroc of the desert. The sight quite dispirited me—I had been told at Hido, that, both at Maui and Oahu, there had been the longest drought known for many years—but, I was not prepared, for such a general and deforming evidence of it.

We reached Diamond Point before noon; and in passing it, as the groves and wide spreading plantations of Waititi, and the vallies and mountains behind them, came upon the eye—followed by the long plain of Honolulu—the port itself adjoining—and the distant country beyond, to the range of mountains far in the west—the same marks of dearth were seen stamped on the whole coast; and so different was the entire face of the country, in this respect, from every former appearance, that I could scarce believe it, the rich and beautiful Oahu, which all visitors have considered the most pleasant and fertile, and been accustomed to call the garden, of the islands of the group.

We dropped anchor at twelve o'clock, in a range with three or four ships in the roads, just as Adams, the pilot, boarded us; and were, at the same time, about announcing our arrival by a salute, when informed by him, that the commander of the fort and all the chiefs were some miles in the country; and that it could not be answered immediately. It was, therefore, postponed, till arrangements on the subject, should be made with the proper authorities.

As soon as a boat could be lowered, Lieutenant Dornin and myself were on our way to the shore—he, to apprise the American consul of Captain Finch's arrival, and I, to meet the embraces of our friends. We were two miles off; and, before reaching the entrance of the harbor, saw a boat approaching, in which I recognised Mr. Jones, the consul. Mr. Dornin having a packet for him, we lay on our oars and spoke her. Mr. French, an American merchant, and Mr. Charlton, His Britannic Majesty's consul, were also in the boat. After an interchange of civilities, and the delivery of the package, we resumed our course, and entered the harbor, filled with ships—whalers, merchantmen, &c., and the native craft—and exhibiting every appearance of a busy and thriving port. Several stone quays are now built, at different places, along that, which was only a sand-beach, when we left. We landed at one of these, opposite the American consulate; and immediately directed our way towards the mission-house.

There are very considerable changes in the appearance of the town near the water; and very great improvements. The coral platform, along the walls of the fort and adjoining point, which, on our arrival in 1823, was the court end of the metropolis, is now converted to a more appropriate use—that of a dock-yard and kind of depot for naval stores. At least, so I judged, from seeing one or two small vessels on the stocks there, and many others undergoing repairs—a large, two story, store-house of stone, &c. &c. The neat wooden building erected at the same place, by the regent Kaahumanu, and occupied, as you recollect, by Lord Byron, during his visit, has been removed into the town, on the level ground, some distance from the water, near Mr. Jones', and fitted with green blinds, a flagstaff, and look-out, stands a conspicuous object, both from the water and on shore, as the "Blonde Hotel," owned by Governor Boki. Besides this, there are many other well-built, European looking structures. Among them a store-house and office of Mr. Charlton, near the water, at the corner of the fort next the town—and a very large and convenient establishment, consisting of warehouse, shop, counting room, and other apartments, belonging to Mr. French. Indeed every appearance indicates an advance in the importance and business of the place.

The arrival of ships seems, now, so much an every day occurrence, as scarce to attract attention, except among the gentlemen in business; and when we landed, the name and character of the Vincennes were not yet generally known on shore.

No suspicion of my arrival was entertained by my former associates, till we he had nearly reached the mission houses ; when we met Rev. Mr. Clark and Dr. Judd, of the last reinforcement to the mission, and shortly after, Mr. Ruggles, with our friend Mr. Hunnewell, still engaged in mercantile pursuits at Honolulu.

My first call I felt due to Mr. and Mrs. Bingham ; and, therefore, made my way to the door of the old, wooden house, opening into the rooms they occupy. From Mrs. Bingham's exclamation, in an inner apartment, on hearing my voice, and Mr. Bingham's hurried entrance, I ascertained, that we had taken them by entire surprise—which Mrs. Judd verified, as she rushed into the room, from an adjoining part of the house. You, my dear H——, can better imagine what my feelings, and what theirs were, for a time, than I describe them. There was a mingling of pain with the fullness of our joy, which, perhaps, all have experienced in meeting those they love, after a long separation ; and, for which, Cowper well accounts, when he resolves it into a necessity, interwove with our natures and our condition—that no earthly happiness shall be without its alloy. At the end of a half hour, and after partaking of some refreshment, Mr. Dornin returned to the village and on board ship—I having made arrangements for a boat towards evening.

It would be impossible to give even an outline of the topics of our conversation, they were so numerous, so varied, and so incongruous—embracing missionaries, chiefs, and people—friends in all parts of the world—scenes of joy and scenes of sorrow—events past, present, and to come ; and calling into exercise ten hundred feelings of joy and sadness, of hope and apprehension, of thanksgiving and prayer : and in such power, as to rouse to excitement many of the strongest affections of the heart.

After an hour or two spent in this manner, I prepared to return on board ship. Mr. Bingham would have accompanied me to call on Captain Finch and my fellow-officers, but it was becoming late—the ship three miles distant—and the captain had sent to ask of him the favour of a translation into the Hawaiian language of the President's letter, and some remarks of his own in an address to the king, to be in readiness for an audience with the government, as soon as the necessary arrangements could be made. On my way to the town, I called on Mrs. Chamberlain and Mrs. Shepherd, who live in a couple of neat, stone cottages, near the printing office, and on Mrs. Clark, Mrs. Ruggles, and Mrs. Green, at Mr. Ellis' house. Mr. Green is at present on the N. W. Coast of America, on an exploring visit among the natives there.

I saw none of the chiefs or people that I knew. The king was out riding—Governor and Madam Boki up the valley toward the Pari—and Kaahumanu, the regent, at her country house, at Manoa. Expresses had been immediately sent, in the various directions, to inform them of the arrival of the Vincennes. The ex-queen, Namahana, died two or three weeks ago ; and Governor Adams, of Hawaii, and the Princess Harieta, and Governor Hoapiri, of Maui, only returned to their respective residences—after attending her during her sickness, and at her funeral—a few days ago. I reached the ship just before dark; and, thus, have at once furnished you with an account of my first day at Oahu.

LETTER VIII.

RECEPTION OF CAPTAIN FINCH AND PARTY, BY THE KING AND REGENT.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Port of Honolulu, }
October 15th, 1829. }

AT daybreak, yesterday, we fired a gun for the pilot, and the boats of the shipping at present here; and were towed into the harbor, during the calm of the morning; and, before breakfast, safely moored in an open and pleasant berth.

At the request of the captain I went early on shore, to learn from Mr. Jones the arrangements made for the firing of a salute, and the reception of himself and officers, by the king and chiefs. And having ascertained, that the salute would be expected and returned at 12 o'clock, and the audience held directly after, I went to the mission house to apprise Mr. Bingham of the necessity of his being prepared with the translations at that time; and, also, to deliver an invitation from Captain Finch, to such of the missionaries as might have it in their power to attend, to be at the palace at the hour appointed for the levee. Mr. Jones had been requested to present the compliments of the captain, in like manner, to the residents and visitors of respectability in port; and to invite their presence on the occasion.

At 12 o'clock, we fired twenty-one guns—the established national salute here—and, soon afterward, Captain Finch, attended by as large a number of the officers as could be spared from necessary duty, left the ship. All were in full dress; and we pulled away, in a handsome procession of four boats, while the guns of the fort were still answering those of the Vincennes. The last of these had just been fired, as the captain's gig approached the moorings of the Tamehameha—the king's finest vessel—which is kept in naval order, in the centre of the port, with a long pennant, banner, and jack flying. Much to our surprise, she commenced a salute, in compliment to the captain's landing; which brought us to our "oars," as the technical phrase is, and obliged the Vincennes, as a matter of course, to return gun for gun, according to established etiquette—making in all eighty-four, whose bellows had echoed far and wide, in little more than twenty minutes. Our landing, consequently, was attended, at least, with noise enough.

We disembarked in front of the consulate, where we were expected to take a glass of wine, before Mr. Jones should conduct us to the palace. Here all the residents and visitors of respectability, including the British consul, and several other English gentlemen, were assembled; and, after a general introduction, a few moments conversation, and some refreshment, a messenger announced the readiness of his Majesty KAUIKEAOULI, or TAMEHAMEHA III., to receive us ; and we formed a procession, led by the captain with the consuls on either side.

The king's establishment, but lately erected, is quite in the outskirts of the town—having the open plain towards Punchbowl Hill, immediately in the rear. In going to it, we, consequently, passed through a principal part of the village. A noisy rabble, such as no part of the island but Honolulu would now present, lined our way on both sides nearly the whole distance ; large numbers of whom, running ahead through the dusty streets, in order to take an additional view after our whole number had passed once by them, made no little annoyance, in addition to the heat of a noonday sun, by the dirt they raised, notwithstanding the attendance of police officers, here and there, to keep them from pressing too closely upon us. The limits to which they could accompany us, however, were before long pointed out, by a large white gate—the entrance to the grounds of the royal residence—at the end of a street we were following, beyond which, none but our party were allowed to pass.

On entering it, we found ourselves in a spacious yard of some acres, enclosed on all sides by a well constructed and high fence, and furnished with two other gates, similar to that through which we had passed—one, on another street, in the direction of the residences of most of the chiefs in the neighborhood of the chapel and mission houses, and the other, inland, towards the hill and valleys. Every thing within, appeared exceedingly neat. On the side of the square at which we entered, and near the gate, there are three or four good sized houses, but not differing, externally, from most of the better kind of native dwellings. These, we were informed, are the dining and sleeping rooms, offices, &c., of the king and his household. At a considerable distance, on the opposite side, stands the palace—a fine, lofty building of thatch, some hundred or more feet in length, fifty or sixty broad, and forty or more high—beautifully finished and ornamented at the corners, from the ground to the peak, and along the ridge of the roof, with a rich edging of fern leaves, the dark brown of which, in their dried state, contrasts prettily with the lighter color, and smoothness of the general covering. It is enclosed by a handsome and substantial palisade fence, with two gates—one large, in front, and a smaller at the side—and a pebbled area within.

As we entered the square, the royal guard were seen under arms, beside the palace, at the gate we were to pass, in double file of a hundred men each—the whole being in a complete uniform of white, with cuffs and colars of scarlet, and black caps. The captain, our old friend Kahuhu, was at their head, in a handsome dress of scarlet, with gold lacings, and expensive sword. As Captain Finch passed, they presented arms, in a style, perfectly en militaire: and at the same time, Kekuanoa, now styled the General, from being at the head of the military forces of the king, appeared at the gate, in the full and rich suit of a major general; and with the gracefulness and polish of a gentleman, received the captain from the consuls, and ushered him through a folding door of glass, into the interior.

Mr. Jones had said to me, that the king's house was a very beautiful building—the most so of any that had ever been erected at the islands; but scarce any thing that could have been told of it, as a structure in the native style, would have prepared me for the coup d'œil, as we passed the threshold.

The whole is one apartment—spacious, light, lofty, and truly elegant. All the timbers in sight, the numerous posts, rafters, and centre pillars, are of a fine, substantial size, and of a dark, hard wood, hewn with the nicest regularity. The lashings of sinit, made of the fibres of the cocoanut bleached white, are put on with such neatness, and wrought into so beautiful a pattern, at close and regular intervals, as to give to the posts and rafters the appearance of being divided into natural sections by them; and to produce, by the whiteness and nice workmanship of the braid, in contrast with the colors of the wood, an effect striking and highly ornamental.

But that, which most attracted my admiration in the building, is an improvement—a device of native ingenuity—of which I was told, we then saw the first specimen, and which gives to the interior a finish, as beautiful as appropriate, to such an edifice. It is a lining, between the timbers and the thatch, screening entirely from sight, the grass of which the external covering is composed; and, which always gave an air of rudeness, and a barn-yard look, even to the handsomest and best finished of their former establishments. The manufacture is from a small, round, mountain vine, of a rich chesnut color—tied horizontally, stem upon stem, as closely as possible, in the manner, and probably in imitation, of the painted window blinds of split bamboo, brought from the East Indies, once much in fashion, and still occasionally seen in the United States.

The whole of the inside, from the floor to the peak of the roof—a height of at least forty feet—is covered with this, seemingly in one piece; imparting, by the beauty of its color and entire effect, an air of richness to the room, not dissimilar to that of the tapestry, and arras hangings of more polished audience chambers.

The floor also is a novelty, and an experiment here: consisting—in place of the ground strewn with rushes or grass, as a foundation for the mats, as was formerly the case—of a pavement of stone and mortar, spread with a cement of lime, having all the smoothness and hardness of marble. Upon this, beautifully, variegated mats of Tauai were spread—forming a carpet as delightful, and appropriate to the climate, as could have been selected. Large windows on either side, and the folding doors of glass at each end, are hung with draperies of crimson damask; besides which, and the mats on the floors, the furniture consists of handsome pier tables, and large mirrors; of a line of glass chandeliers suspended through the centre, with lustres and candelabra of bronze, ornamented or-molu, affixed to the pillars lining the sides and ends of the apartment; and of portraits in oil of the late king and queen, taken in London, placed, at the upper end, in carved frames richly gilt.

Such, dear H——, is the reception room of His Majesty of Hawaii, in 1829. Contrasted with the one, into which you were received, in 1823—in those days considered highly respectable and elegant—and with that, in which Lord Byron and suite were ushered, in 1825, the difference is equal, almost, to the improvements that would take place in a century, in the abodes of royalty in most other countries; and greater than that, which now exists, between the new and the old rooms in Windsor Castle. I do not fear being thought extravagant, in saying, that this palace of KAUIKEAOULI would, even in the Royal Park, form a rustic pavilion, in which his Majesty of England might occasionally lounge, not only with comfort, but with delight.

But as there are no ante-rooms, I am keeping you a long time in the presence, without an approach to the throne. In the middle of the room, about sixty feet in front, or two thirds the length of the apartment, the young monarch was seated, in an arm chair, spread with a splendid cloak of yellow feathers. His dress was the Windsor uniform, of the first rank, with epaulettes of gold—the present of George IV.—and an underdress of white, with silk stockings and pumps. On a sofa, immediately on his right, were Kaahumanu, the regent, and the two ex-queens, Kināu—at present the wife of General Kekuanāoa—and Kekauruohe. Being in mourning, they were in well-made, and becoming dresses of black, with ruffs, and caps of white, trimmed with love-ribbon. Governor and Madame Boki had not arrived from the country ; and the only other chiefs in the room, were those of inferior rank, holding different offices in the establishment of the king, and who, in military dresses, stood in household style, at intervals of some yards against the walls.

A range of chairs swept off on either side from the king and chiefs, in a circle towards the entrance, for the accommodation of our party ; and at the foot of the row on the left hand, were Mr. Bingham, Mr. and Mrs. Ruggles, Mr. and Mrs. Chamberlain, Dr. and Mrs. Judd, Mrs. Green, Miss Ward, Mr. Clark, and Mr. Shepherd, of the Mission.

The introduction, by Mr. Jones, took place in the order of rank. I did not need the civility ; and only regretted, that a first meeting with those in whom I feel so deep an interest, should be on a formal and public occasion. Our greetings, however, were most cordial, as I passed them in my order in the train ; and were renewed again and again, on their part, as soon as the courtesy due to my companions as strangers, allowed them to direct their attention to me. This ceremony with the chieftains over, the captain and officers crossed the room to the missionaries, to interchange salutations with them, when we became seated for business ; the captain on the left of the king, the consuls next, with the gentlemen of the Vincennes and mission family on one side, and the merchants, visitors, residents, &c., to the number of thirty or forty, on the other.

Captain Finch, having chosen to avail himself of Mr. Bingham's services, as interpreter, requested him to take a seat at his side ; and then rising, read to the king, in a distinct and impressive manner, the following address.

King Tamehameha,

The president of the United States has confided to my care a written communication for yourself, and such counsellors as you rely upon ; accompanying it with various presents, for each ; in testimony of the good opinion he entertains of you, individually, and to evince his desire for amity and confidence, in all intercourse that may subsist, between your people and my countrymen.

That the genuineness of the letter may not be questioned, which might have been the case, if the transmission had been intrusted to casual conveyance ; and to make it the more honorable to yourself, he has dispatched a ship of war for this and other purposes : and it is enjoined upon me as the commander, to deliver it in person into your keeping ; to reiterate the expressions of good will which it contains ; and to exhibit by my own deportment, the sincerity of the motives which has actuated him.

The friendly and kind reception afforded by your government to one other of our national ships, the Peacock, has been most favorably represented by her commander, and doubtless has conduced greatly to the visit which I now make.

The improved state of your people has also been so interestingly described by one of your friends, the Rev. Mr. Stewart, now beside me, as to awaken among my countrymen at large, great benevolence of feeling towards you ; and it will be my study, and

I trust I shall be warranted on my return among them, to strengthen their prepossessions in your favor, and to confirm the accounts of the good traits of character of our new acquaintances, the islanders, subject to your authority.

With your leave I will now acquit myself of the pleasing duty devolving upon me, by reading and handing the document adverted to ; which illustrates the light in which the president wishes to hold your nation ; and upon which you will, I hope, ponder often, deliberately, and fully.

The presents I also ask permission to distribute amongst those of your faithful friends for whom they are intended ; trusting that they will tend to the enlargement of knowledge, invite to social and rational enjoyments ; and further, secure enduring recollections of the assurances which I give of the disinterested friendship of the president and government of the United States.

W. C. B. FINCH.

October 14th, 1829.

Mr. Bingham having read a translation of this in the Hawaiian tongue, Captain Finch proceeded in the perusal of the document from the government.

TO TAMEHAMEHA III.

KING OF THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

Navy Department of the United States of America, }
City of Washington, 20th January, A. D. 1829. }

By the approbation and direction of the president of the United States, I address you this letter, and send it by the hands of Captain William Compton

Bolton Finch, an officer in our navy, commanding the ship of war Vincennes.

Captain Finch also bears to you, from the president, certain small tokens of regard, for yourself and the chiefs who are near to you, and is commanded to express to you, in his name, the anxious desire which he feels for your prosperity and advancement in the arts of civilized life, and for the cultivation of harmony and good will between your nation, and the people of the United States. He has heard, with interest and admiration, of the rapid progress which has been made by your people, in acquiring a knowledge of letters and of the True Religion—the Religion of the Christian's Bible. These are the best, and the only means, by which the prosperity and happiness of nations can be advanced and continued; and the president, and all men every where, who wish well to yourself and your people, earnestly hope that you will continue to cultivate them, and to protect and encourage those by whom they are brought to you.

The president also anxiously hopes that peace, and kindness, and justice, will prevail between your people and those citizens of the United States who visit your islands; and that the regulations of your government will be such as to enforce them upon all.

Our citizens who violate your laws, or interfere with your regulations, violate at the same time their duty to their own government and country, and merit censure and punishment. We have heard with pain that this has sometimes been the case; and we have sought to know and to punish those who are guilty. Captain Finch is commanded diligently to inquire into the conduct of our citizens, whom he may find at the islands ; and, as far as he has the authority, to insure proper conduct and deportment from them.

The president hopes, however, that there are very few who so act as to deserve censure or punishment ; and, for all others, he solicits the kindness and protection of your government, that their interests may be promoted, and every facility given to them in the transaction of their business. Among others, he bespeaks your favor to those who have taken up their residence with you, to promote the cause of religion and learning in your islands. He does not doubt that their motives are pure, and their objects most friendly to the happiness of your people ; and that they will so conduct themselves, as to merit the protecting kindness of your government.

One of their number, the Rev. C. S. Stewart, who resided for some time with you, has received the favor of his government in an appointment to an office of religion in our navy, and will visit you in company with Captain Finch.

The president salutes you with respect, and wishes you peace, happiness, and prosperity.

SAML. L. SOUTHARD.

Secretary of the Navy.

This also was immediately made intelligible to the king and chiefs, by a translation in the native language, read by Mr. Bingham.

Both documents were listened to with intense interest. I never before saw Kaahumanu more excited. She seemed scarce able to command her feelings; and before Mr. Southard's letter was finished, her eyes were filled with tears. "Maitai—maitai no!" "good—good indeed!" uttered with the quick tone, in which he usually speaks when pleased, was the hasty comment of the king; while the females, with bright faces, re-echoed the approbation, "maitai no—maitai no!"

Both papers were then placed by the captain in the hands of the king, who received them with a more formal expression of his satisfaction by saying, that himself and chiefs were highly favored by such a communication; and acknowledged his obligations to Captain Finch as the bearer of it, and for the kind sentiments with which it had been delivered. The servants having charge of the presents were now called, and these placed before the king. A pair of globes, celestial, and terrestrial, and a large map of the United States, for himself: a silver vase, inscribed with the arms of the United States, and her name, for the regent: two silver goblets, with inscriptions of a similar character, for the princess: and two large maps of the world, one for Governor Boki, and the other for Governor Adams.

The kind acceptance of these, led to a renewal of the sentiments of good will previously manifested on the part of the captain; in the midst of which, Governor Boki, accompanied by Manuia, captain of the fort, in a riding suit, with cap and whip in hand, made his appearance. He had just dismounted; and apologized for the lateness of his arrival, and undress, by saying, that both himself and Madam Boki were ill when summoned to the palace; and the latter still too unwell to come to town. After a moment's conversation with him, the king invited the captain and officers to a glass of wine, and led the way to a side table, handsomely laid with a superb set of cut glass—stained and ornamented with cameos in white—on large trays of silver plate. This movement broke up the formality of the seated circle, and various familiar groups were formed in different parts of the room, engaged in easy and pleasant conversation.

TAMEHAMEHA III., or as more generally styled, KAUIKEAOULI, instead of the little boy you knew, in 1825, is now a fine, stout young man of sixteen; as graceful, well-bred, and perfectly gentleman-like in his whole deportment, as any lad of his age in the most polished circles of our country. I was highly gratified with the dignity and propriety of his demeanour: and still more so, to learn that his private character is as unexceptionable, as his public appearance is manly and becoming the station he occupies.

At the end of an hour we took our leave, much pleased with the whole entertainment—the guards, still on post, presenting arms again as we passed. The officers expressed themselves astonished at the reception; and seemed half disposed to charge me with having deceived them, in the representations I had made—both in my published account, and in private conversations—of the state of advancement among the people. On disavowing this, and expressing the surprise I had myself experienced—notwithstanding my knowledge of their state only four years ago—they replied, that the truth then must be, which is unquestionably the fact, that the reports given of the people by the missionaries and by visitors, have by no means kept pace with the rapid strides making by them, in the various departments of civilization and refinement.

LETTER IX.

A MORNING VISIT TO THE PRINCIPAL CHIEFS.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Port of Honolulu, }
October 16th, 1829. }

ON leaving the palace yesterday, Captain Finch and myself, accompanied by Mr. Jones, called on the ladies of the British consul's family, and on those of the mission; and took dinner afterwards at the American consulate.

The usual weekly prayer meeting of the mission family occurred in the evening. Lieutenant Stribling and myself attended; and in the participation of its elevating and happy influences, in the midst of those who we, dear H——, must ever regard, in a peculiar manner, as our sisters and our brothers—in joining in their praises and their prayers, in receiving their affectionate Christian salutations, and in imparting to them such encouragement and exhortation as I could present from the land of their fathers, and the churches of their special love—I enjoyed one of those seasons of Christian communion and sympathy, which cheers and animates the heart with a power above the charm of ordinary intercourse.

Early after the introduction to the government, Captain Finch received the following note, in the native language, from the regent.

Captain Finch,

I am made joyful by your arrival here, with good counsel for us. Now, if you desire it, there is the house of two stories, built by my brother, Karaimoku; it is quite at your service, for your accommodation to lodge on shore.

The house is not very good—we are not very well furnished, but I am happy to show you hospitality and kindness.

ELIZABETH KAAHUMANU.

Oahu, October 15th, 1829.

The house referred to, is the large stone residence erected by Karaimoku, during the visit of the royal party in England. Since his death, it has remained unoccupied, and is unfurnished, which explains the apology at the close of the communication. I subjoin the answer.

TO ELIZABETH KAAHUMANU.

Regent,

Your letter is very gratifying to me, and I give you thanks for it.

I would accept the house which you offer, as a residence during my short stay here, but it has not been my custom to live outside of the walls of my vessel.

Mr. Jones, our consul, has already offered me a suitable apartment, but I declined accepting it.

I value this proof of your desire to extend hospitality to me, quite as much as if I actually enjoyed it.

I sincerely desire your welfare; and am happy in having been the herald of advice which you esteem good for you.

Let what my government has said to you, engage your deepest attention—honest motives have dictated the language it has used.

W. C. B. FINCH.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Honolulu, }
October 16th, 1829. }

After this reply had been dispatched this morning, I accompanied Captain Finch in an informal call on the principal chiefs at their respective residences.

We landed at eleven o'clock; and, following the street towards the mission houses, made our visits according to the order of dwellings, without reference to the relative rank of the occupants. The first inclosure we came to, is that of Kekuanaoa. Like that of the king, it is large and neatly kept, differing entirely, in this respect, from the state in which the precincts of their habitations were once seen. The general was walking in front of one of the buildings; and, on perceiving us, hastened himself to point out the entrance, and open the gate.

On this chieftain, at least, the peep had of the Court of St. James—when in Great Britain with his late royal master—has not been lost. There is much of the ease and courteousness of high life in all his movements ; and in his manners, figure, dress, and whole deportment, that which would secure to him the epithet of a "gentleman" in any society.

We had approached the rear, as was discovered, instead of the front of his establishment ; and to reach the principal apartment, or rather house—for every room is a distinct building—were conducted by him first through that, which, from a spread table and sideboard, evidently was a dining hall ; and then through another with accommodations for sleeping. I by no means regretted this, however, when I perceived the perfect neatness, good taste, and keeping of each. Had I entered them by accident, without knowing to whom they belonged, I should not have thought of being in the residence of a native, but, from the finish of every part, and from the furniture, in that of some foreign gentleman.

The sitting room is delightful. A large door at each end opens a fine draft for the air : the floor was beautifully carpeted with mats ; while, in the centre, stood a rich couch of yellow damask, with armed chairs placed on either side, so that those occupying them, enjoyed all the benefit of the breeze sweeping through. On one side, a native lounge or divan extended the whole length of the apartment. Spread with a succession of the finest mats beautifully variegated with stained grass, and furnished with round pillows of damask and silk velvet, it looked more tempting to us, on entering from the noontide heat of a tropical day, than the ottomans of more polished drawing-rooms would under circumstances of less lassitude. A pier table covered with a rich cloth, a large mirror, and a portrait of Manuia, completed the furniture on this side. On that opposite, a curtain or screen of handsome chintz, looped up a foot or two at the bottom, partially disclosed, as it waved with the wind, the boudoir of Madam Kekuanoa, a principal article of its furniture being an elegant writing table, with papers and books in the language of the country. From this she appeared to have risen, as we entered the farther door. Her dress, manner, and whole deportment in receiving us, were those of a lady. A neatly bound copy of the Gospel of Luke, in the Hawaiian version, the first I had seen, was found lying on the sofa, with a blank book, in which she had been writing.

The captain was exceedingly pleased with this specimen of private life; and, for some time, could scarce say anything, but in admiration of the whole establishment, and in gratulation to our friends, at the comparative luxury of comfort in which they were living. After much pleasant conversation, which I was enabled, with the assistance of Kekuanoa's English, to interpret, and a glass of wine politely handed by the master of the house himself, for not a common native was within hearing—a change which you can scarce credit when you think of the dirty, idle throng formerly ever swarming about the houses and visitors of the chiefs—we took leave, saying, that we intended continuing our calls among their compeers. On hearing this, they both exclaimed, "kakou pu,"—"all of us together;" and the lady taking the arm of the captain, and the general one of mine, we proceeded a few rods farther to the house of Kekauruohe the ex-queen, and her husband, Kanaina.

These two, also, are among the most interesting of the aristocracy ; and, of their claims to respect and attention, we needed no other proof, than that afforded on the present occasion. The entrance is by a large folding door—the lower pannels painted green, and the upper part of glass—into a spacious room floored with mats, and furnished, as that we had left, in its whole length on one side with an inviting lounge, and, on the opposite, with a side table and mirror. A semicircle of chairs, with a centre table, occupied the middle ; and at each of the further corners, stood a handsome cabinet, surmounted by a bookcase top, with glass doors and silk hangings. At the one, the lady of the house was seated, and at the other her husband ; both engaged in writing, with books, slates, and papers around them. A curtain of chintz separated this room from one of equal size behind : of which a tent door in the centre, festooned with loops and buttons, gave so much of a view, as to show it to be a large and appropriately furnished sleeping and dressing room.

We were received here, with the same kindness and ease of manner observed at the general's. Mr. Bingham, hearing that we were in the vicinity, came in ; and, by his facility as interpreter, added to the pleasantness of the visit. The captain adverted to the manner in which they were occupied, on our entrance, and requested to see their handwriting. They both write with great readiness ; and the husband with a freedom and command of hand that would class him among good penman anywhere. Both are among the most studious and improving of their compeers ; and merit the encomium and encouragement, which the captain was kind enough to bestow upon the evidences he had of their attainments, in the elements of literature. Before leaving, a well dressed servant was summoned, and refreshments of wine, &c. offered ; and salutations and good wishes interchanged, with as much urbanity and good grace on their part, as if they had been accustomed to such usages from childhood.

On saying that we were going still farther to the regent's, the whole company joined us ; and we proceeded to her residence.

Every thing, here, was not less pleasant and interesting than at the other houses, though there was more of the air of an old lady's mansion. An easy chair, and low old fashioned sofa, both covered with chintz, were conspicuous articles of furniture ; and two young chiefs, a girl and a boy, the children of Kekuanaoa, hanging about her, like spoiled pets on a fond grandmama at home.

The old queen herself, was in high good humour. With her portly figure and commanding face, in a handsome dress of black silk, a black crape shawl, and white collar and cap of lace, we felt as if before a respectable matron of our own nation ; and returned her salutations with as much respect and good will, as they were with kindness given. The children, like all present, were dressed in the European style ; the girl, four years old, in a white muslin, with a blue silk cap and ostrich feathers ; and the boy, about two, also in white, with cap of wrought muslin, trimmed with lace and ribbons. Two female servants only, were in attendance—Kanakina, as feather-bearer to her majesty—and a pretty, modest looking girl in blue silk and plain handkerchief, as maid in waiting, behind her mistress' chair.

Much lively and agreeable conversation took place; principally, on our part, in congratulating them on their advancement in the true sources of enjoyment, and on theirs, in expressing their happiness in our visit, and in the kind advice received from our government and from Captain Finch. I know not when I have myself been more highly delighted, or more affectingly impressed, with the changes which have taken place here, and are still rapidly going on. In a single circle now before me, I beheld five of the highest chiefs of the islands—those whom I had myself known as naked, debauched heathen, not only addicted to vice, but glorying in their shame—respectably and even tastefully dressed; demeaning themselves with all the propriety and courteousness of civilized society; modest and decorous in all their actions; pure and intelligent in their conversation; and surrounded, in the furniture and accommodations of their dwellings, not merely by the comforts, but also by many of the elegancies of an advanced state of improvement; and this, most evidently, not for the exhibition of an hour, but in proof of their present ordinary mode of life. In view of the magnitude and extent of the change, I could but inwardly exclaim—especially as I looked on Kaahumanu, who for fifty-three years lived and hardened in all the grossness of paganism, a debauchee in private character, a terrific despot in her public rule—surely it is a truth, that “the eyes of these have been opened, and they turned from darkness unto light, and from the power of Satan unto God!”

Scarcely any thing in the contrast, passing in my mind, struck me more forcibly than that connected with the appearance of the children. In place of being utterly unclothed, as would have been the case ten, and even five years ago, left entirely to the management of a rude train of attendants, and screaming with terror, at the approach or look of any civilized being, we beheld them neatly and elegantly clad, differing from children at home only in their color, and receiving not only the fondlings of their parents and relatives, but courting, by the cleanliness of their whole persons and every appearance, the caresses of the captain and myself.

Here also we were offered refreshments, at a side-board spread with cake, wine, &c. On completing our visit, we went to the printing office, where native workmen were busily engaged in setting type, and in working the press. A call on some of the ladies of the mission—leaving our cards for the king, who was not at home—and a visit of a few minutes to Mr. Marin, the Spanish resident, where we tasted a very palatable wine, the production of his own vineyard, made it past four o'clock when we reached the ship to dinner.

LETTER X.

EVENING DRIVE AND VISIT TO THE VALLEY OF MANOA.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Port of Honolulu, }
 October 18th, 1829. }

Two evenings since, Mr. Bingham gave Lieut. Stribling and myself a drive as far as Allen's on the plain. It was at a delightful hour of the day; and, as most of the gentry were taking the air, we had an opportunity of judging of the degree of improvement, in point of equipage, &c., made at the metropolis. The vehicle in which we rode is the property of the mission; but, in place of the ox cart and porter's barrow of former years—in both of which I remember you, my dear H——, had occasionally the honor of a seat—it is a light painted wagon, of the kind called Dearborn in America, drawn by a good horse, affording a comfortable, and, for this part of the world, a respectable conveyance. Several of these, belonging to the chiefs and residents, were seen at different points of the road, besides numbers of horsemen, both foreigners and natives, genteelly equipt—among the latter of whom, we recognized the general, and his brother-in-law, Kanaina.

The American consul has a country seat on the plain towards Manoa; and a principal equipage met by us belongs to him. It was built at Oahu, and is rather a non-descript—something between a New England pedler's wagon, and a coach, early after “the birth-day of invention” in that luxury. It is constructed almost exclusively of wood, with Venetian blinds in place of curtains; is swung low, and has a wooden boot in the centre, for the feet, descending almost to the ground. With wheels and carriage of red, body of sky blue, and a red box high in front for a native driver, it makes no inconsiderable display, as it rumbles over the plain. It was drawn by one horse; and contained two or three gentlemen, one of whom I perceived to be our Captain.

Shortly afterwards, a gig without a top, very similar in its style and finish to the preceding, except in something of a tilbury height—and, apparently, of the same manufacture, was seen dashing at full speed up the street. It contained two gayly dressed females in opera hats, with streamers of satin flying far behind—the one on the right bearing the reins, and occasionally flourishing a whip, with all the tact of a leader of the ton, figuring in curricule or phaeton, on a more distinguished drive. As they whirled past, I recognized, in their light complexions and broad faces, the sisters, —— and Mrs. M——.

The variety was still kept up, in the appearance behind these, of four fashionables on horseback; two, in bonnets and mantles, mounted on side saddles, in the manner in which ladies ride in America and England; and two à la Peru—astride with pantalets and the Manilla hat: the poncho alone being needed to complete the costume of the coast.

To the picture thus presented in single figures and in groupings, add one or two handsome and well finished gigs, such as are driven by the wealthiest gentlemen in our country, and in the scene you will perceive, I think, in contrast with the recollection of by-gone years, evidences of a march of body, if not of "the march of mind."

Allen keeps pace with his neighbors in improvements. All the numerous buildings in his establishment are in good order, and now very conspicuous, both from land and sea, by being stuccoed and whitewashed. From the same cause, the mission houses look less gloomy than they did; and by the whiteness of the stone cottages and printing office opposite the old wooden edifice, throw quite an air of cheerfulness over the nakedness and sterility of that part of the plain.

The valley of Manoa, you recollect, was always a favorite resort of mine—this afternoon Mr. Bingham drove me in a wagon to it. There is now a good carriage road, in that direction, as far as the country house of Kaahumanu, nearly five miles from Honolulu. Her residence is beautifully situated; and the selection of the spot quite in taste. The house is an inferior building, but stands on the height of a gently swelling knoll, commanding, in front, an open and extensive view of all the rich plantations of the valley; of the mountain streams meandering through them, and the humble habitations of the farmer sprinkled around; of the district of Waititi; and of Diamond Hill, and a considerable part of the plain, with the ocean far beyond. On the right, the ground rises rapidly for a few rods, to a thicket of hibiscus and eugenia, at the foot of a magnificent mountain, exhibiting from the base to its summit—a perpendicular height of a thousand feet—as rich a variety of projecting cliff and wild recess, of dripping rocks and mantling foliage, of graceful creeper, pendant shrub, and splendid flower, as Arcadia itself can boast. On the left, there is a gradual descent, from the house, of two or three hundred feet to the depth of the valley. Here this is half a mile wide, and bounded, at that distance, by a spur of mountain, which, commencing at the entrance of the valley on the plain, two or three miles in front, rises first in uncovered swellings, but rapidly assumes, as it runs inland, a bolder formation, till in several places it presents a succession of broad based and regularly defined pyramids, beautifully verdant and tufted with wood; giving a most peculiar character to that section of the scenery.

Immediately behind the house, and partially flanking it on either side, is a delightful grove of the dark leaved and crimson blossomed Ohia, so thick and so shady as insensibly to remind one of Cowper's Wilderness at Olney—filled with cool and retired walks and natural retreats, and echoing to the cheerful notes of the little songsters, who find security in its shades, to build their nest and lay their young. The view of the head of the valley inland, from the clumps and single trees edging this copse, is very rich and beautiful; presenting a circuit of two or three miles, delightfully variegated by hill and dale, wood and lawn, and inclosed in a sweep of splendid mountains, one of which in the centre rises to a height of three thousand feet.

In one edge of this grove, a few rods from the house, stands a little cottage built by Kaahumanu, for the accommodation of the missionaries who visit her when at this residence. It is scarce twelve feet square in the area, and not as many high, but furnished with glazed windows and doors, a bedstead and lounge, a small table and chair, answers, delightfully, as the prophet's chamber in the wall of her habitation; and is very frequently occupied a day or two at a time, by one and another of the families most enervated by the heat and dust, the toil, and various exhausting cares of the establishment at the seashore.

While examining this little retreat, the eventide, with its sober shades and meditative influences, began to approach; and, feeling that we were in a place where prayer is wont to be made, as brethren united by many of the strongest ties, we spent amid the silence and quietude around, one moment before our God, in praise for the past, and in prayer for all that is to come.

LETTER XI.

EDICT OF THE KING IN ANSWER TO A MEMORIAL OF THE BRITISH RESIDENTS.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Port of Honolulu, }
October 19th, 1829.

THE degree of civilization to which the chiefs and many of the islanders have attained, and the increasing importance of this group as a place of commerce, --as a maritime depot, and a resort for repairs and refreshment by whaling ships and other vessels traversing the Pacific, seem to render it both important and desirable, that a monthly or other periodical newspaper in the Hawaiian and English languages should be published at this port.

It has been necessary, on several occasions, for two or three years past, to resort to printed handbills as a substitute for something of this character ; and the demand for these by the king and chiefs is such, and the material for a useful publication so abundant, that were it possible for any of the missionaries, at present, to find time for the superintendence of a it, the world would speedily be furnished with a "HAWAIIAN HERALD AND SANDWICH ISLAND REGISTER." Captain Finch and several of the officers in the Vincennes have joined me in strong recommendations for such a paper.

A first order of the king and regent, after the audience on the 14th, was for printing, in handbills, the address of Captain Finch and the letter of the President, to be circulated among the nobles of the land, and the more intelligent of the people. This has been done ; and several copies politely sent, by the king, to Captain Finch and his officers. It had been preceded only a few days, by a document published, in like manner, by royal authority. This was an edict, addressed by the government to the foreign residents ; and being the first official proclamation ever made by the chiefs to this class of dwellers in the land, is worthy of preservation. Every syllable of it is of unaided and unadvised, native composition ; and requires some preliminary explanations to make its meaning and force perfectly intelligible.

Foreign residents of every grade, with few exceptions, have ever denied the right of judicature over them, to the government of the Islands ; and have tenaciously held the new political doctrine, that the laws of the country in which they dwell, are for their protection, and not their obedience. And not only this, but I believe I am warranted by facts in saying, that in general, they have been decidedly opposed to the establishment of all defined public laws, even for the government of the native subjects themselves, under a pretense that if laws were formed, they would be made by the missionaries ; but in reality, I fear, because they wished the whole nation to remain lawless, upon all points not affecting the interests of their own property or persons.

The abolition of idolatry, and adoption of the Christian religion, the consequent change in the whole condition of the people, the introduction of new customs and formation of new habits, the dissemination of letters and truth, and the establishment of the press, have rendered new and wholesome laws not only desirable, but absolutely necessary. The most intelligent and influential of recent visitors at the islands have seen this necessity, and have urged upon the government the importance of enacting and enforcing laws conformable to the light and knowledge they now possess.

So early as the summer of 1825, Lord Byron, during his visit in H. B. M. ship Blonde, at a general council of the chiefs, convened principally for the purpose of acknowledging the right of the present king to the throne, and of appointing a regency during the minority, took occasion to submit to them a brief schedule of civil polity adapted to their new state, and a set of maritime regulations in reference to foreign shipping frequenting the port. The last were put into immediate operation, to the abrogation of others, more unequal and exorbitant, previously existing.

The suggestions of this nobleman, however, referred rather to the form of government, and the respective and relative rights of the king, chiefs, and people, and to the tenure of lands, &c., than to a criminal or municipal code; and towards the close of the same year, an attempt was made, by the regents and their associates, to lay a foundation for laws affecting these points. This was by a public discussion of the precepts of the Decalogue—as presenting the highest principles of moral and social action—at a council then convened; with the design of publishing the ten commandments without any penal obligations to their obedience, preparatory to the promulgation of specific laws founded upon them. Some of the missionaries had been invited by the regents, Karaimoku and Kaahumanu, to be present; on information of which among the residents, a party of leading individuals from their number, violently and riotously interrupted the council, with such menaces and threats against the members of the mission, even to the taking of life, that the chiefs were utterly intimidated; and for the time, relinquished their purpose.

Two years afterwards, however, in December 1827—notwithstanding that the opposition of foreigners in general to the establishment of all legislative restraint on vice had continued to increase, rather than to diminish—the king and chiefs in a general council, determined on the promulgation of laws against murder, theft, and adultery: the first to be punishable with death, and the other two with imprisonment in irons.

The proclamation of these, with their respective penalties, was first made by the king in person—supported by the Regent Kaahumanu, by Governor Boki, and all the high chiefs—in a grove of cocoa-nut trees near the sea shore, to an immense throng of the people, and many foreigners. They were immediately reduced to printing, by the authority of the government, and extensively circulated in handbills. Shortly after, an addition was made to the code, of others against gambling, drunkenness, prostitution, a profanation of the sabbath, by improper amusements or labor, and against cohabitation, where the persons did not regard themselves as husband and wife.

These historical data will enable you fully to understand the first part of the edict. A detail of a different character is necessary to throw light on the second and third sections.

It is an ancient and established custom of the country, that any animal breaking through the fence or inclosure of a plantation, and injuring the crop contained in it, becomes forfeit to the possessor of the premises. In most cases, however, a restoration to the original owner takes place, either with, or without a small compensation for the injury sustained.

A British resident, whose dwelling and gardens are in the immediate vicinity of a crowded population, chose, as appears on the face of the edict, without having given to the natives around any notice of his intention, to shoot every animal of his neighbors, whether fowl, pig, or goat, making its way into his grounds. This arbitrary proceeding, so different from the general usage among themselves, offended and exasperated the islanders; and, on this point, the gentleman became obnoxious to their ill will and resentment.

The large plain skirting the coast eastward of Honolulu, is a common, for the pasturage of all the horses, neat cattle, &c., in the vicinity, belonging either to the natives, or foreigners. Open in one part to the beautiful and productive valley of Manao, the plantations bordering it there, are exposed to depredations from the flocks and herds left grazing at night; and it has been publicly ordered, and is customary, to have them secured in yards, by their owners, every evening. Mr. —, the gentleman alluded to, neglected this injunction, though specially requested to attend to it; and a fine milch cow of his herd, becoming troublesome and destructive to one of the plantations, was caught and detained by the planter, with the intention of securing damages for the spoliations of his crop. On hearing this, Mr. —, became exceedingly angry; and in going to the man for the release of the animal, instead of offering a remuneration for the injury sustained, reproved him for the seizure in violent and threatening terms.

The result was, that the cow making another inroad on the same premises, was shot by the farmer; but escaped from the inclosure to the common, before she fell and died.

This fact was soon reported to Mr. —; and, joined by an American of equal rank, he mounted his horse, and riding immediately to Manao—without reporting the case to the king, or any of the chiefs, or recognizing their authority to investigate the conduct, and punish the offences of their own subjects—seized the farmer, and pinioning his arms, tied a halter round his neck, and on horseback, dragged the native behind him three miles to the town.

The speed at which the gentlemen rode, was such, that the islander, after running till entirely exhausted, fell, and was hauled along the ground till greatly bruised—so much so, it is said, as to have several ribs injured, besides being much excoriated—and till the cord round his neck was strangling him. An islander at hand, perceiving this, had the resolution to run and cut the rope with a knife, in the fear that unless immediately relieved, he would die. On reaching Honolulu, he was, by the order of these gentlemen, put in irons, and thrust into the fort—the usual place of confinement—where he still remains, too ill to be removed.

These facts have been related to me, precisely as stated by various natives, both chiefs and common people: some of them eye-witnesses of the whole transaction, and one, the individual who cut the cord, to save the life of the prisoner. A public meeting of the English residents was soon called, of which Mr. Charlton, the British consul, was appointed chairman. Affecting to consider their property, and even their lives, no longer in safety at the islands, it was resolved, that a memorial signed by the whole number, should be presented by their consul to the king, expressive of their fears, and appealing to the government for protection.

A document of this character was accordingly drawn up, and formally laid before the king, through Governor Boki as secretary of state, with a request that the answer might be carefully prepared, as it was to be transmitted to his Britannic majesty's minister for foreign affairs, in London.

The king immediately called a council; and the following answer was written, and delivered to Mr. Charlton—a copy, at the same time, being sent to the mission press, with a request that it should be printed in a handbill, both in the English and native language.

The memorialists were so little satisfied with the edict, that they denounced the most violent threats against its publication. The excitement on the subject was such, that gentlemen who have ever been most friendly to the missionaries and their object, and the constant defenders of their characters, earnestly advised that the document should not be printed, lest unhappy consequences might result. But no satisfactory reason for disobliging the king and government, by refusing to print, being presented, it was determined to hazard any ill consequences which might befall them, in the exercise of their just rights; and they committed it to the press.

Furnished thus with its history, you will find some interest in a perusal of the article. The following is a literal translation, printed on the same sheet with the original, in the Hawaiian language.

(TRANSLATION.)

These are the names of the King of the Islands,

KAUIKEAOULI, the King. KAAHUMANU, Regent. BOKI, Governor of Oahu. ADAMS KUAKINI, Governor of Hawaii. MANUIA, KEKUANAOGA, HINAU, AIKANAKA, PAKI, KINAU, JOHN II, JAMES KAHUHU.

Oahu, October 7, 1829.

I. This is my decision for you. We assent to the request of the English residents; we grant the protection of the laws ; that is the sum of your petition.

This therefore is my proclamation, which I make known to you, all people from foreign countries :— The laws of my country prohibit murder, theft, adultery, prostitution, retailing ardent spirits at houses for selling spirits, amusements on the sabbath day, gambling and betting on the sabbath day, and at all times.

If any man shall transgress any of these laws, he is liable to the penalty ; the same for every foreigner, and for the people of these islands—whoever shall violate these laws shall be punished.

This also I make known—The law of the great God of heaven, that is the great thing by which we shall promote peace ; let all men who remain here obey it.

Christian marriage is proper for men and women. But if a woman regard a man as her only husband, and the man regard the woman as his only wife, they are legally husband and wife ; but if the parties are not married, nor regard themselves as husband and wife, let them be forthwith entirely separate.

II. This is also our decision, which I now declare to you. We have seen your wickedness heretofore. You did not warn us that your dooryards and inclosed plantations were tabu before the time when our animals went into your inclosures : you unhesitatingly killed our animals. But we warned you of the tabu of our plantations before the time when the animals came into them, even yours ; and then it was told again to you that have cattle ; but for some days past we have known your cattle to come in to eat up what we had planted ; on that account some of your cattle are dead.

This then is the way to obtain justice : if you judged the man guilty, you are not forthwith to punish him ; wait till we have a consultation first : then, had we judged him guilty, we would have given you damages ; but no, you rashly and suddenly injured the man ; that is one of the crimes of two of you. And we state to you all that the wounding of a beast is by no means equal to the wounding of a man, inasmuch as man is chief over all the beasts.

This is our communication to you all, ye parents from the countries whence originate the winds : have compassion on a nation of little children, very small and young, who are yet in mental darkness, and help us to do right, and follow with us that which will be for the best good of this our country.

III. As to the recent death of the cow : she died for breaking a tabu for the protection of the plantation. The place was defended also by a fence built by the owner of the plantation. Having secured his field by a fence, what remained to be done was the duty of the owners of cattle, who were told by him who had charge of the plantation, to bring home their cattle at evening. He did tell them so ; but they did not regard it : and in the night they came in, but not by day. On that account the owner of the plantation hoped to recover damage ; for many were the cattle that were taken up before, but no damage was recovered for the crop they had devoured ; the owners plead them off without paying damage, therefore he to whom belonged the crop, determined that one of the cattle should die for destroying the crop : for it had been said that if any of the cattle should come into the inclosure devouring the crop, such cattle would be forfeited and become the property of the owner of the crop. Many have been seized, but they were begged off and given up again ; this has been done many times. Why then are you so quick to be angry ? For within the inclosure was the place where the cow was wounded, after which she made her way out. What then means your declaration that the cow was wantonly shot in the common ? The cow would not have been killed for simply grazing in the common pasture ; her feeding upon the cultivated crop was well known by those who had the care of the plantation.

(Signed.)

VISIT AT LAHAINA IN MAUI.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Byron's Bay, }
 October 28th, 1829. }

As you will readily believe, the accomplishment of an early visit to Lahaina was a first thought, after the arrival of our ship at the islands. The Vincennes was not expected to go to the windward again ; and, hearing of no immediate opportunity of making the voyage, I determined, early after the official interview with the king and chiefs, to express my wishes to the regent.

I accordingly called at her residence for this purpose, the second morning we were in the harbor. I found her seated, in a loose morning robe of richly striped satin, in front of a large mirror, making her toilet—her head being under the comb and brush of a native dressing maid. She was in the finest spirits, and, on congratulating her on her seeming happiness, she replied that her heart had known nothing but joy since the arrival of the Vincennes, and since she heard the palapala, or letter of the president, and knew the manao, or sentiments of Captain Finch.

After a lively, and on her part quite facetious conversation, I mentioned the object of my call, on which she immediately said that her own pilot boat—the fastest sailer among the vessels of the government—should be immediately at my command, to go to Maui and to return, at my pleasure. The morning of the 19th was fixed for sailing; and the captain, in addition to a leave of absence for ten days to myself, having given permission for four gentlemen of the steerage to join me, I had the pleasure of the company of midshipmen Irving, Huntt, Bissell, and Anthony.

At the time appointed every thing was in readiness, and we sailed shortly after breakfast—Captain Finch having previously boarded us in his gig, to see the accommodations of the schooner, and our prospects of comfort for the passage. From all former experience of voyages in native vessels, I had not promised my companions much in this respect ; and was agreeably disappointed in finding the cleanliness and whole state of our little craft equal to those of any similar vessel in our own country, with a commander, mate, and six or eight common sailors, differing only in color from the crew of a coaster at home. In their dress, general deportment, civilities to us as passengers, and good management of the vessel, they appeared equally respectable and skilful.

The captain and mate seemed both piously disposed, and held worship on deck by reading a chapter in the Testament, a hymn, and by prayer, regularly at the setting and rising of the sun. The prayers of both were as intelligent, appropriate, and apparently devout, as any that would be heard under similar circumstances, on the waters of America or Great Britain.

By twelve o'clock on the 20th we were in full view of Lahaina, and soon after dropped anchor inside of eight or ten whale ships, and, in a few minutes, I was in the embrace of those bound to us by ties, never to be forgotten or dissolved. You, at least, dear H—, can more readily imagine, than I describe, the character of a first interview with Mr. and Mrs. Richards, and the nature of our feelings ; and can enter into the warmth of my thanksgiving, as I beheld them sitting in health and prosperity, "beneath their own vine and fig-tree, with none to make them afraid," on the very spot, where, four years before, I had parted from them, under circumstances of peculiar danger and sorrow.

My reception by the chiefs, the governor, and his wife, the princess, &c., and by numbers of our former parishioners and special friends, was most warm hearted and affecting—many of them bathing my hands with tears as they pressed them to their hearts and lips, while many “lifted up their voices and wept aloud.” As the news of my arrival spread rapidly through the district, “aroha—aroha Mita Tuata!—aroha maitai! aroha ioa Mita Tuata!”—“Love, love to you, Mr. Stewart! the best love! the strongest love to you, Mr. Stewart!” echoed on every side where I appeared, whether at a window, at the doors, or in the street. For two days, in whatever direction I went, the same salutations were heard from every plantation, and from every grove.

You, my dear H—, were far from being forgotten ; and, with our little household, shared fully in every demonstration of remembrance and affection. “Aroha Mita Tuata-Vahine, aroha Kali, aroha Harrieta a me Beke!” “Love to Mrs. Stewart, love to Charles, love to Harriet, together with Betsey,” (Stockton,)—with an occasional substitution of the native names of the children, Hoapiri and Tamehamaru—invariably followed their greetings to myself. Betsey Stockton is held in grateful recollection, both by the chiefs and common people. It was under her immediate auspices and instruction, as you know, that the first school among the farmers and their families in Lahaina was established, at the close of the year 1824. Schools of the kind are almost as extensive now as the population, not only of Lahaina, but of Maui itself, with its dependencies, Ranai, and Morotai. Several individuals composing the original number of her scholars, have become hopefully pious ; and several are among the best qualified and efficient of the native instructors.

Your namesake, the princess, manifests a very tender regard for you. Several times, during the first few days of our visit, she was observed to be abstracted and sad, while tears often started and trembled in her eyes. Mr. Irving, perceiving this on one occasion, inquired of Mrs. Richards the cause. She asked the princess, who replied, "It is thoughts of Mrs. Stewart—it is sorrow, it is pain, to think how coldly I loved her when here, and how little I, then, regarded her instructions and her advice. I am dead (or overcome) with shame." The change in her personal appearance, since 1825, is even greater than that noticed in her brother, the king. We left her at that time, you recollect, a slender and delicate child of ten ; but now—though little more than fourteen—she is a tall and full grown woman, with a form en bon point. The rapidity of her growth has been such, that she seems scarce accustomed, herself, to the change in her size ; and has lost as much in the gracefulness of movement, for which she was so remarkable, as she has in the elegance of her figure. The uncommon brilliance and life of her eye, however, the intelligence, amiability, and playfulness of her expression, and her fine teeth, remain unchanged ; and are advantages, that render her, personally, agreeable and interesting.

Our former neighbors at Lahaina, Auwae, the chief of Wairuku, and his wife, now reside in that district, thirty miles beyond the mountains. When at Lahaina some weeks since, on hearing of my expected visit, they made arrangements to be informed by express of my arrival at Maui; and the same evening we landed, an islander was dispatched to them with the intelligence. The messenger made the journey entirely on foot, and the chieftains and their train traveled half the distance in the same manner—accomplishing the remainder, on this side of the island, in canoes—still, they were at the mission house before breakfast, the second day of our visit.

They are both hopefully and warmly pious; and so deep are their impressions of the ingratitude and sinfulness of having neglected to give their minds and hearts, at an earlier period, to our instructions, and to the power of religion, while we were residents with them, that neither of them could speak on the subject without tears. Each of them has written a long and interesting letter to you, principally in reference to this point.

The attachment of the natives of every class, indeed, to the institutions established among them, is now exceedingly great; and their gratitude and love to those who have been the means of securing such blessings to them, seemingly unbounded. All apparently regard Mr. Richards as their best friend and benefactor; and himself and Mrs. Richards feel that they, their family, and associates, are dwelling in the bosom of a population, who would shrink from no sacrifice to support, comfort, and defend them. Peace, order, gratitude, and external good morals alone, now characterize the settlement ; and in every aspect and development of character, the inhabitants of Lahaina are decidedly and interestingly a Christian people.

The same evening we landed, provisions, in great abundance, were sent as presents to us from the chiefs ; and for three days following, the gateway to the mission house was hourly thronged with processions of families, and schools, and single individuals, men, women, and children, old and young, rich and poor, all bearing some gift, within compass of their means, in testimony of their respect and affection. But for the motive and design of this voluntary tribute, I should have been amused by the exhibitions in the mission yard. Nothing could be refused ; and the whole premises looked like a fair—heaps of potatoes, taro, sugar cane, cabbages, melons, coconuts, and bananas, were piled on every side ; while in one place was tied a squealing pig, and in another a bleating goat ; here a dozen of squalling fowls, and there as many quacking ducks ; all joining with sympathetic cadence in the cries of their respective fellows, still constantly arriving.

The scene was novel to the midshipmen ; and their gravity entirely overcome by it, as, in the general uproar, an old woman, in her best apparel, a black silk gown, straw bonnet, and printed shawl, made her way to me, in the midst of our circle in the sitting-room, with a petulant rooster under one arm, and a noisy duck under the other, both which she was desirous of transferring at once to my personal good keeping !

The quantity of vegetables and live stock thus imposed on our acceptance, was not only sufficient for the use of the missionary family, including our party during our stay, but also to half freight the schooner, and supply the ship's company on our return.

Mr. Richard's house, though erected at an expense to the American Board, of less than four hundred dollars, is a large, well built edifice of stone, two stories high, with a veranda on each floor in front ; presenting as comfortable and substantial an aspect, as most farm houses in our own country. The situation is convenient, and as pleasant as any in the settlement, with sufficient ground for a garden in the rear, and a small lawn, shaded by a noble tree, in front. Mr. Andrews—who, with Mrs. Andrews, and Miss Ogden, is also at this station—occupies at present a thatched house, in an adjoining inclosure, but is preparing to build a habitation similar to that of Mr. Richards.

The example of building in stone and mortar was early imitated by the islanders ; and, besides the mission house, there are now several dwellings erected along the beach, in the same style, and almost equally respectable in their appearance and finish. One, not yet entirely completed, belongs to the princess, and another to Maaro, the secretary of Hoapiri, governor of Maui, and an assistant of Mr. Richards in the translation of the Scriptures. This last is located on a slight elevation, with a strip of meadow-like ground in front. Stuccoed and whitened, it rises conspicuously and beautifully amidst the surrounding verdure ; and my eye never fell on it without a recurrence to the passage in the charge of Dr. Worcester, then secretary of the American Board, to the pioneers of the mission, in which, after pointing out the general objects of the enterprise in which they were about to engage, he calls upon them not to be satisfied with their labors, till the whole land shall be filled, not only with school houses and churches, but with "pleasant dwellings." Such truly is this of Maaro ; and, in my view, it stands in no doubtful pledge, that ultimately, and even at an early period, the face of every island will be covered with many, equally entitled to the interesting epithet.

The entire plan of the house was projected, the building raised and finished, with the exception of the sashes of the windows, and similar delicate work, by Maaro himself, and the native assistance he could command ; and will long remain a monument of his ingenuity and persevering industry. Our party visited him several times ; and when examining the construction and arrangement of his cottage, the furniture and good keeping of the whole, connected with the dress and appearance of himself and wife, we could scarce believe ourselves in the dwelling, listening to the conversation and partaking of the hospitality of those, who, within a few years, were living in all the degradation and debauchery of heathenism.

Among the architectural improvements at Lahaina, I must not forget the chapel now erecting. It also is of stone, ninety-eight feet long, and sixty-two broad, two stories in height, to be furnished with galleries, and calculated to afford seats for three thousand hearers. The walls are finished, and the roof nearly in readiness to be placed upon them. It is pleasantly situated near the finest grove of cocoanut trees in the district—has been erected exclusively at the expense of the governor and chiefs of Maui—and, when completed, will be the most substantial and noble structure in the Polynesian Islands.

We found similar improvements here in the style of living and domestic comforts of the chiefs, as at Oahu; and were particularly gratified in a visit to the new residence of the ex-queen Kakauonohi, and her husband Keariiiahonui, nearly a mile inland from the beach. The approach to it is by a carriage road, branching from the turnpike—which runs through Lahaina, and extends several miles along the coast: on either side of it, a recent work of Gov. Hoapiri—and terminating, by a circular sweep, in front of the principal building.

Our call was made the second evening of our arrival, in company with the princess, and one or two others. Keariiiahonui, the finest looking man in the nation, of noble figure, and, but for the loss of his front teeth—knocked out in testimony of grief, at the death of Tamehameha the Great in 1819—decidedly handsome in face, received us some distance from the entrance; where, Kekanouohi, in a white muslin, with satin sash, and hair put up, à la mode Parisienne, in richly carved combs of tortoise shell, stood ready also to give us a cordial welcome.

The first room we entered was large and airy, and furnished as a parlor ; and, in addition to chairs, tables, and a side-board, had a mahogany hand-organ at one end. The whole apartment, as well as another adjoining, into which we afterwards passed, was hung with festoons of the aromatic and sweet scented mairè, intertwined with other evergreens. The second room, nearly as spacious as the first, was for sleeping, and contained two large field bedsteads, of a handsome, dark, cabinet wood, surmounted by canopies hung with curtains of chintz ; a toilet-table—covered with white cushions, and hung with draperies of muslin, festooned with ribbon—beneath a glass, in a gilt frame, sufficiently large to reflect the whole figure ; and an immense lounge, or native bed of mats, spread with silk velvet in place of sheets, with a counterpane or upper covering of satin—a couch as luxurious in material, at least, as many that afford repose to the first nobles in Christendom.

Two well dressed servants, a male and a female, stood at either end of the side-board to serve the wine, fruit, cocoanut-water, &c., that were offered us.

In making visits of this kind to the chiefs, in walking over the settlement, in riding on horseback—horses, with good saddles and bridles, being daily furnished us by order of the princess—in excursions on the water in canoes, also at our service, in attending an examination of a principal school, &c., &c., besides the enjoyment of the society of our friends at the mission house—the time flew rapidly by, and almost before we were aware of it, the limited period of our absence had elapsed ; and yesterday morning we were obliged, reluctantly, to prepare for a return.

The day previous, Governor Adams and Naihe, the hereditary counsellor of the nation, with Kapiolani, his wife, had arrived from Hawaii on their way to Oahu, to visit Captain Finch. They came in the governor's brig, the Waverly, accompanied by a smaller vessel. The governor of Maui, the princess, with Miss Young—a bosom companion, daughter of John Young of Hawaii, the oldest foreign resident at the island—and Kekauonohi, had made arrangements to return with us ; the governor and train in a topsail schooner, and the princess, with the queen to matronise her, in another ; and after a painful farewell to our friends, and joining the pilot-boat, all our vessels filled away for Oahu in company.

At day-break this morning, we were off Diamond Hill. Two whale ships had joined our little squadron in the night, and we approached the port in a fleet of seven sail. The brig of Governor Adams arrived first, but we in time to be taken from the pilot-boat by a cutter sent for us, and to be welcomed on board the Vincennes before the ship's company had been piped to breakfast.

LETTER XIII.

VISIT OF CAPTAIN FINCH TO THE PRINCESS, AND ENTERTAINMENT OF THE CHIEFS ON BOARD SHIP.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Port of Honolulu, }
October 29th, 1829.

Mr. and Mrs. Bishop had arrived at Honolulu a day or two previous to my trip to Maui; and early yesterday morning, Mr. Bishop with Mr. Bingham came on board the Vincennes, and after making a call, returned by invitation, to dine with Captain Finch.

It had been arranged that the Captain should wait on the princess and the chieftains from the windward in the afternoon, at the residence of the king; and at four o'clock, we all left the ship together for that purpose. We found them assembled, with most of their compeers, at the place appointed; and the whole company appeared greatly delighted with the conversation of an hour which followed. And with good reason; for in addition to the pleasantness and urbanity which has marked all his intercourse with them, he took occasion, at this time, to give them much very important advice, in reference to their rights as a government, and the principles by which they should regulate their public measures, and upon which they should found their laws.

This was given principally, in answer to questions proposed by one and another; especially by the king, Governor Adams, and Naihe. Among other points, he assured them of a right which most foreigners, by their conduct at least, have endeavored to persuade them that they do not possess—that of forming laws which shall be binding on all persons at the island, both natives and visitors; and, also, of the privilege of presenting to our government any complaint they have to make of the deportment of American citizens which has been displeasing to them.

All light, as to their national and political privileges, has been so carefully concealed from them by most persons who could with propriety have imparted it, that they hung on his remarks with the deepest interest; and manifested so high a degree of gratification and delight, that the interview was prolonged till quite the dusk of the evening.

In the dress, manners, and general appearance of the princess and Kapiolani, we had the most decisive evidence, that an elevation of character among the chieftains, is by no means confined to the metropolis, but that both Maui and Hawaii can boast examples, as interesting in their exhibitions, as any to be found at the islands. The princess, in a neat and fashionably made straw colored satin, with a handsome pelérine of the same, and hair simply arranged with combs, by the propriety and dignity of her manners, and the animation with which she occasionally expressed herself in reference to the topics in discussion, made a very favorable impression on the captain, as an intelligent and fine young woman; while Kapiolani, in an Italian silk of a grave color, with a gauze handkerchief and lace cap, at a single look, was pronounced not only a most pleasing and fine looking woman, but to have all the air and manner of a middle aged matron at home.

No one seemed more to rejoice in the encouraging and liberal conversation of the captain, and in the various manifestations made by him of sincere and disinterested friendship, than this individual. At two or three different times, I saw her dash the tears from her eyes, with her handkerchief; and, on leaving the house, to proceed to the weekly lecture at the chapel, the tears dropt from her cheeks as she took my arm, and exclaimed, "O, Mr. Stewart, greatly indeed are we favored in the visit of this captain of a man-of-war, and greatly are we blest in such a communication from the high chief of America—great indeed is the joy of my heart, for I have a thought that THE CAPTIVITY OF HAWAII (by which term, as thus used, the whole group is designated) IS NIGH TO AN END." An event of which, in the language of the poet I would say, not only by the chieftains and islanders themselves, but by every philanthropist and lover of his race.

"It were a consummation most devoutly to be wished,"

Long, indeed, has Hawaii been in captivity: in a captivity of paganism, in a captivity of ignorance, superstition, and fear, in a captivity to the licentiousness of too many who have visited her, and in a captivity to their imposition and deceit. But her gods of wood and of stone are no more—He, who would have all men every where to worship Him in spirit and in truth, is the only deity now acknowledged and adored—letters and religion are fast expelling the terrors of darkness and death, and the unblushing vice which once stalked abroad at noon-day, is now obliged, in a measure at least, to hide its head: and let but a few such visits as that of the Vincennes be made to her distant shores, a few such documents as that of Mr. Southard be placed in the hands of her rulers, and a few such friends as Captain Finch impart to them his enlightened views, and important counsels in reference to their municipal enactments, commercial engagements, and political relations, and the captivity of Hawaii will be not only nigh, but fully to an end!

The Vincennes having been entirely overhauled and painted anew, is now in fine order; and all the chiefs expected at Oahu during our visit having arrived, to-day was fixed on to receive the king and chiefs on board, and pay to them the honors of the ship. The invitation was given by the captain, at the close of his interview with the government yesterday. The weather, though bright and clear, was very unfavorable this morning, in point of wind. Till near night it blew a gale—making any movement, either on land or water, not only very unpleasant, but almost impracticable. It was too late, however, to make a different arrangement; and the boats were dispatched to bring the party on board.

At 12 o'clock, their return with the company was reported by a quarter-master; on which the yards were manned by the crew, in their muster-dress of white frocks and trowsers trimmed with blue, and black hats and shoes. The officers were in full dress; the guard of marines under arms; the band on the quarter-deck ; and the Hawaiian flag flying at the foremast-head. The king, princess, regent, and Governor Boki, came in the first boat, and were received with three cheers from the yards, the guard presenting arms, and the band playing "God save the king !" And, as soon as the whole party, including the two consuls, and Mr. Bingham and Bishop, had been received and escorted to the poop, a salute of twenty-one guns was fired—the highest honor of our service being thus paid to his Hawaiian majesty and court.

The visitors appeared to great advantage. The king, and most of the male chiefs being in full and rich military uniform ; and the females appropriately and elegantly attired—principally in dresses of black, with black hats and ostrich plumes. Since the use of European dresses has become habitual, I have not had much opportunity of observing the degree of good judgment shown in the selection of their suits, in reference to time and seasons, and thought it probable that some incongruity might be perceived. But such was not the case.

The princess has been the subject of much conversation, since the arrival of the Vincennes ; and this being her first appearance before the officers, I was particularly anxious that her costume should be comme il faut ; and had a fear, that notwithstanding the blustering character of the day, and the hour of the entertainment, under an impression that she must be finely attired, she might choose some light evening costume, unsuitable for the occasion ; and from that fact, perhaps, was more forcibly struck with her appearance, as she came over the side of the ship, than I should otherwise have been. The best advisers could not have selected from her wardrobe a more becoming and appropriate suit : consisting of an elegant walking-dress of purple silk velvet, made in London, richly trimmed with satin and velvet of the same color, and finished at the cuffs and collar with ruffles blonde ; with a bonnet of salmon-colored silk, white silk stockings, and black satin shoes—the whole constituting a genteel and becoming dress.

The entertainment, after the salute, consisted of the playing of the band, while refreshments of wine, &c., were served on deck ; of the exercise of the crew and marines, at the guns, as in battle ; boarding and repelling boarders, &c. &c., an exhibition which greatly delighted the king and male chiefs. They were then escorted around the different decks, and shown the whole ship, after which they partook of a handsome collation in the cabin, remaining on board till near 4 o'clock, much gratified with the attentions shown them, and the kind of entertainment given ; and the captain and officers, not less impressed with the propriety and respectability of their whole appearance and deportment.

LETTER XIV.

GENERAL EXAMINATION OF THE SCHOOLS OF OAHU.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Port of Honolulu, }
 October 31st, 1829.

WITHIN a few days of the arrival of our ship at Oahu, a regular quarterly examination of the schools of Honolulu occurred. Captain Finch and a party of officers attended the exhibition in the afternoon ; when the classes most advanced, embracing several hundred scholars, presented evidences of their attainments in reading and writing, in the elements of arithmetic, geography, and biblical history, in recitations from the Scriptures, in catechetical exercises, and in singing, highly interesting and satisfactory.

Many of the scholars, both male and female, write well ; quite as much so as most persons of common education in our own country ; and all manifested as full an understanding in the acquisitions made, as would be found among scholars at a similar exhibition at home.

The king and the chiefs, including Governor and Madam Boki, appeared at the head of their respective classes, manifesting not only in their example, but by their whole manner, the laudable ambition of being first in useful knowledge, as they are first in rank. One of the exercises of the king, was that of reading aloud, in the English language, which he did with unexpected facility, and with great distinctness of enunciation, and correctness of accent. He understands much that is spoken in this tongue, but usually is unwilling to attempt speaking it himself seemingly from an apprehension of committing blunders.

One pleasing exhibition on the occasion, was that of a basket of needle work, prepared by a class of young girls, under the instruction of Miss Ward. The articles were all beautifully finished—as much so, as if the work of a skilful mantuamaker. Many of the native females have become so expert in dress making, that the elegance and finish of garments made by them have greatly surprised us; and the demand for their services is such, that they obtain an abundant support by the exercise of the art.

While at Lahiana, I also had an opportunity of judging of the advancement made by the chiefs and others there, in exhibitions of a similar kind, by scholars under the superintendence of Mr. Andrews and Miss Ogden. The princess and her class are in advance of all others at that station, as her brother and his immediate associates are at this place. Arithmetic proves to be a very favorite study with the islanders; and they take great delight in the exercise of mind required in it. With the princess, I am told, this is particularly the case; and a chief amusement of herself and companions, is in exercises in the elementary rules of the art, and in simple and compound reduction—the limits of the progress yet made, I believe, by any of the nation.

Notwithstanding the attendance of Captain Finch and his officers at the quarterly exhibition of this kind, Kaahumanu felt desirous of presenting to them a more imposing spectacle in a general examination of the schools of the whole island; and early information of the design was circulated through the various districts of Oahu, and other arrangements made for its execution.

It occurred yesterday; and took place in the chapel—a building one hundred and ninety-eight feet in length, by seventy-eight in breadth. The scholars included persons of every age, and the number was very great, amounting to many thousands—even thousands more than could be received in the chapel at the same time; and the examination took place by districts.

The morning was appropriated to a review, in this manner, of the schools most recently established in distant parts of the island, and to those whose proficiency extended only to reading: and the chapel was two or three times successively filled with these, arranged by schools, in regular lines along its matted floor. The people were almost exclusively dressed in native cloth, but all in new garments: many of which, consisting of immense folds arranged around the figure with taste and gracefulness, were of great beauty. In general, each school was in uniform: some in mantles and kilheis of black, some of yellow, some of pink, some of white, some striped, some spotted, some plain, meeting the eye, as seen in a single mass spread over so extensive an area, in lively and agreeable effect.

I never, on any occasion of festivity and amusement, during my residence at the islands, in which a multitude of the people have been brought together, saw evidences of greater interest and pleasure in the passing scenes, whether of the song or of the dance, or of a trial of skill in their various sports and games, than were now manifested—brightness and smiles were on every face; and all seemed desirous of giving testimony to the importance and value placed by them, on the attainments they are making, and of the happiness they find in the new order of things. The sight, with associations unavoidably arising from it in my mind, was at once delightful and affecting.

The afternoon, as in the previous instance, had been appropriated, in the arrangements for the day, to the schools and classes in advance of the general population; and as large a number of the officers as could be spared from duty, left the ship with Captain Finch at four o'clock, to proceed to the chapel. The chiefs and a large number of foreigners, visitors, and residents, including the consuls—who had learned that there was to be more than ordinary display—were already assembled, and waiting our arrival.

For the gratification of the gentlemen of the Vincennes, this opportunity was taken of exhibiting so much of their former style of dress, &c., as would be consistent with modesty of person and propriety of deportment. The schools occupied about two-thirds of the chapel; the remaining part had been appropriated to the accommodation of the female chiefs, and kept in reserve for them, till, with all the ancient paraphernalia of chieftainship, they had been borne in procession from their respective residences to the chapel. The display made by these, as seen from the seats to which we were conducted, was beautiful and imposing.

The princess occupied the centre of the space reserved. She was seated on the farther end from us of a portable throne—consisting of a light platform, twenty feet in length, and six in breadth, at an elevation of four feet. This was covered with many thicknesses of the finest and most beautifully colored native cloth, hanging in thick and graceful drapery to the floor. Behind her, and at regular intervals along the sides, the finest looking of the inferior male chieftains were stationed, in splendid cloaks of yellow and scarlet feathers, each supporting a kahilè, or feathered staff of state, thirty feet in height ; the staffs or handles—two-thirds of the whole length—being composed of highly polished, alternate rings of tortoise shell and ivory, and the upper ends of feathers ; in compact cylinders, nearly two feet in diameter ; some crimson, some black, some green, and others, again, yellow, imparting a greater air of dignity and power than can well be imagined by those, who have never seen them poised over the heads of the nobles whose rank they proclaim, or waving with stateliness in the breeze at a procession.

That there might be as little departure as possible from the primitive dress, without a sacrifice of modesty, the princess wore only a loose slip of black satin, made close in the neck, with long sleeves ; over which, from the waist down, appeared, as she was seated in the Turkish attitude, the most beautifully wrought and splendid article of feathers ever made at the islands—a pau or native petticoat of yellow, edged with alternate points of black and scarlet, and lined with crimson satin—covering, not only the lower part of her person, but spreading widely in rich careless folds, over the whole of the platform. A beautiful feather cape, in a pattern of black and crimson on a yellow ground, hung from her shoulders; around her neck were several wreaths, and upon her head a triple coronet of yellow and crimson of the same material. At a short distance on her left, in a large chair of state, festooned with capes and wreaths of feathers, and elevated three feet from the floor, was Kinau, in the same costume as the princess, except that her pau consisted of an immense quantity of gay colored tapa; and having smaller kahilès, borne by petty chiefs. On the left of her, again, was a throne, similar to that of the princess, but much smaller, surrounded by feather bearers, on which were seated the son and daughter of Kekuanao, in expensive European dresses. On the right of the princess, and corresponding in every respect with Kinau, were Kekaunohi, Madam Boki and Kekaurohoë, with their feather bearers—the whole forming a semicircle of aboriginal splendor, immediately opposite our seats, at a distance of fifteen or twenty feet. Kaahumanu and Kapiolani, in their ordinary dresses, in European style, were seen indistinctly through the crowd of attendants behind the chairs of state, bearing kahilès, as in the train of the princess. The grouping of the whole, consisting of some forty individuals, was very impressive ; and, by its novelty as well as richness, excited great admiration.

To be placed so conspicuously before us, as a spectacle to be gazed at, rather than as presiding over the examination, was an awkward situation for Harieta, as now usually called ; but she acquitted herself with great propriety, and was much complimented, especially for the handsome manner in which an expression of politeness to Captain Finch—unexpected, and, I should judge, unthought of, even by herself, till the moment—was made immediately after our entrance. The seat to which he was conducted was directly in front of hers, though at a distance of some thirty feet. As soon as he recognized her in her new attire, he rose and made her a very marked bow : on returning which, she immediately dismantled herself of the feather cape upon her shoulders, and dispatched a young chief with it as a present to him. The compliment was so handsome and so prompt, that the captain placed it at once upon his own shoulders, and wore it during the exhibition, in evidence of the kindness with which it had been received.

The examination consisted, like all others of a similar kind, of specimens in reading and writing, exercises in arithmetic, &c. &c., concluding, at the end of an hour or more, with a hymn and short prayer. The greater portion of the specimens of writing and of composition, among those most advanced, were letters addressed to myself, in expression of the happiness occasioned by my visit, and of the views of the different writers upon the subjects of learning and religion. Some hundred of these, I should think, were committed to me by the writers, after being subjected to the inspection of the various foreigners present. Among these were some, who take little interest in the advances of every kind making by the people, and who affect to believe, and who say, that no good has ever been accomplished by the mission, and that the people have no capacity for knowledge. To such, the gratification exhibited by our party at the attainments manifest, and the encomiums past by them, both on the teachers and the pupils, were any thing but agreeable: a fact which they could not disguise. The attention of a principal officer was attracted by the readiness, and apparent understanding, with which a large class repeated, what he was told was the multiplication table; and expressed his surprise and pleasure to one of these gentlemen seated beside him; to which he replied, with a look expressive of great contempt—“All parrot-like, sir, all parrot-like—they now nothing about what they are saying!” Almost immediately after, a young man brought a slate with a large and complex sum in addition upon it, presenting it to the officer to know whether it was correct. It was found to be perfectly so: and turning to Mr. —, he said with a laugh—“A parrot possibly might learn to repeat the multiplication table, Mr. —, but it would require a wise bird to add such a series of columns together, without a mistake!”

Understanding that the females would leave the chapel in procession, Captain Finch and myself walked out before them, and took a stand in the upper veranda of the palace built by Karamoku—commanding a fine view of the whole street from the chapel to the house, where they were to be set down. The children of Kekuanaoa came first ; but, unaccustomed to this ancient mode of conveyance, the moment their couch of state became elevated on the shoulders of its bearers, and moved forward with its compliment of feathered staffs and train, the young nobles began screaming so loudly, that their attendants were obliged to receive them to their arms from their lofty seats, and allow the pageant to pass on unoccupied. Next came the queens, and last, the princess, preceded by the king and suit on foot, and escorted by a file of the royal guards on either side, to keep open a passage sufficiently wide for her throne and its bearers, amidst the immense throng of gayly dressed thousands around.

The scene thus presented in a single coup d'œil was highly exciting. This bearing of some favorite of a nation upon the heads of the people has always been associated in my mind with a state of high-wrought enthusiasm—an enthusiasm springing from a just admiration and a sincere love for the object calling it into action—and the sympathetic influence of which seizes irresistibly on the heart, even of an uninterested spectator. I could not free myself from an influence of the kind on this occasion—nor was it necessary ; for she who was thus borne aloft, surrounded by all the glory of her rank and the gaze of ten thousand eyes, was the joy of the people and the delight of the whole nation. And while I gazed in admiration on the animated and youthful favorite passing triumphantly along, beneath a canopy of magnificent kahilès nodding with grace and stateliness in the breeze—as cheer after cheer from the wide-spread and admiring multitude greeted her on her way—I thought, and remarked, that the pageant, though destitute of the gilding of equipage and comparison of horse found in other countries, equalled, if it did not surpass, in its effect upon the eye and upon the heart, the most gorgeous and princely train I ever witnessed.

At the close of the quarterly examination, a fortnight ago, Mrs. Bingham entertained Captain Finch and officers, with the king, and regent, and members of the mission, at tea; and we at this time met the same company, with the addition of a greater number of the chiefs, at the cottage of Mrs. Ruggles and Mrs. Clark. On the former occasion, the captain, with the king on one side and the regent on the other, through the interpretation of Mr. Bingham, had new evidences afforded him of their intelligence and affability; and on the present, a demonstration was given that a whole circle of their compeers are no strangers to the etiquette of a tea-drinking.

LETTER XV.

AN EVENING MEETING AND SABBATH SCENES.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Port of Honolulu, }
Nov. 2d, 1820. }

SOME of the incidents of the last forty-eight hours have been among the most interesting, dear H——, that I have ever witnessed here.

On Saturday evening I attended a meeting for religious conversation and prayer. It was held in a large school-house, near the residences of the principal chiefs, and was composed of persons of every rank and condition among the people. There were circumstances in the mere approach to the spot sufficient to impart seriousness and solemnity to the mind ever accustomed to higher thoughts than those of which the things of this world are worthy. Numbers from various quarters, wrapped in their large mantles, were still silently and slowly assembling—seemingly with hearts prepared, by the gray of the evening and musings on the object bringing them together, for meditations of eternity and the sincere worship of their God.

No light prattle or giddy laugh, no unbecoming levity in look or manner, betrayed the careless mind or a spirit little concerned in the services before it; but all appeared to be cherishing thoughts and affections suited to a place of seriousness and prayer.

On entering the lowly door and humble but spacious apartment, the light of a few tin lamps, at long intervals against the posts supporting the roof, fell dimly on the countenances and figures of at least a thousand of these sable tribes, all waiting in profound silence the arrival of a teacher in the things of eternity. We took our seats at a small table near a door, in the midst of them, and waited ourselves till those yet entering should find places. Among the number of these was an Albino, though a pure native, and another a blind man, of fine countenance and noble figure, with deep seriousness marked on his features, as, by the guidance of a friend whose hand he held, he was led near the table, and became seated on the mats at our feet.

There was in this incident that which at once brought into exercise those better feelings we all delight to exercise at such hours and in such a place ; and my thoughts were, as I gazed with deep interest on this afflicted islander—seeking in the darkness of the night by the kindness of another, that light, which though invisible to the natural eye, is emphatically the “light of the world,” and the “light of life”—“happy, happy art thou, though blind, if seeking light from the great Physician ! happy, though afflicted, if, conscious of a darkness of soul as well as of body, thy earnest cry is, ‘Jesus, thou son of David, have mercy on me !’”

After a hymn and prayer, and a few remarks suited to the occasion, any one who felt desirous of asking a question, or of expressing a sentiment upon the subjects for which the meeting was instituted, was requested to speak ; upon which much interesting conversation between one and another, and Mr. Bingham, took place. The remarks, and the feelings of many thus unfolded, were deeply touching, and fully demonstrated the efficacy of the Gospel, in enlightening the mind and melting the heart of man in his most uncultivated state.

The sceptic may discredit, and the cold moralist doubt, but he who knows from his own experience, that there is a power in the truth of God which is above the power of man, and, who has felt its influence pervading his own soul, and bringing him sweetly into captivity to the gospel, knows that what the wisdom of the wise can never in itself attain, the most ignorant and the most obscure by submitting unreservedly to the simple truths of the Most High, and to the guidance of his Holy Spirit, are sure to win.

Yesterday morning we had our usual sabbath service on board ship, and did not attend at the mission chapel. After dinner, however, Mr. Stribling and myself went on shore for the purpose of joining in the native worship at four o'clock. We had been apprised of the intended administration of the Lord's Supper at that time, and anticipated, with no little satisfaction, the privilege of partaking of this sacred ordinance in so remote a part of the world, in the bosom of a church but lately gathered from heathenism.

The chapel, the dimensions of which I recollect already to have stated, was erected, at the expense of the chiefs, within the last six months. It is in the native style, beautifully thatched, and furnished with several lofty folding doors, and large windows of glass at the sides and ends. The pulpit is in the middle of one side, and is a neat piece of workmanship, with cushions and hangings of crimson damask. A square of considerable dimensions, in front of this, is lined with sofas, chairs and settees for the accommodation of the chiefs, mission family, and a choir of singers, consisting of twenty or thirty well dressed young persons of both sexes, with the king at their head.

Many of the more respectable of the congregation besides the aristocracy, provide themselves with chairs and other seats in various parts of the house ; but the mass of the audience sit closely together upon the matted floor only. The neatness and cleanliness of dress, the respectability, order, and seriousness of the thousands constituting the customary assemblage on the sabbath, are most impressive and have excited the admiration of all who have witnessed it.

On entering, we found the immense area of the building, as usual, greatly crowded ; and the services just commencing by a hymn and a prayer. It is not customary to have a sermon on these occasions ; and, at the conclusion of another hymn, after the prayer, the names of seven individuals were announced as those now to be received into the church. They had been in a state of probation for some months, and were called on to present themselves publicly to profess their belief in the articles of the Christian faith, and to take upon them the vows of the church covenant. This they did, standing in front of the pulpit and communion table, surrounded by the members of the church, occupying two rows of seats on the square inclosing it.

Five were men and two women—from twenty to forty-five years of age—all dressed in good suits of European clothes, and manifesting in their whole aspect, a respectability and a degree of solemnity and seeming genuine feeling so striking, as irresistibly to impart corresponding emotions to the bosom of the spectator. The dresses of the females were becoming and appropriate—plain, neat, and modest; especially that of the younger of the two, whose unornamented gown, of snow white cambric, with turban to match, well became the composed seriousness of a strikingly mild and amiable countenance. Her husband, one of the young men making this profession, in a frockcoat of blue cloth with white cravat, vest and pantaloons, made an equally interesting appearance.

After assenting to the articles of faith, and taking on them the obligations contained in the church covenant, they were all baptized: and then, each for himself, both male and female, subscribed his name to the roll of the church, subjoined to the preceding documents, and all were proclaimed members of the church, entitled to all the privileges of the relation, and commended to the special love and care of their fellows of the household faith.

This ceremony was succeeded, by the presentation for baptism, of several infants, neatly dressed like children with us at home. One of the most so, was that of the individuals whose dresses I have mentioned ; and as I looked with deep feelings on the little family group they formed before the baptismal font, I could but inwardly exclaim, in view of their past condition, " happy parents, thus to have learned, and to have secured blessings, of which, many a long line of progenitors never conceived ! happy child ! thus to have been born in a day, when no murderous hand will add you to the fearful number whose earliest breathings have been sternly stifled in death, but when, with humble prayer you are received from the arms of parental love, into the bosom of the church, and made one of the flock whose leader and whose defender is the good Shepherd who careth for his sheep, and who carries the lambs in his bosom !" After this, four men presented themselves as candidates, to be received after a suitable period of probation. One of them was the blind man whose appearance had interested me the evening before, and another the friend, now as then, guiding his darkened way through the crowded mass around.

A general invitation was then given to all professors of religion, among the strangers present—of whom there were several—to partake in the breaking of bread, and the drinking of wine in the name of him who said, "This do in remembrance of me," with the request, that any such would make themselves known by rising. Mr. Stribling and myself were the only persons thus answering : on which we were joined in our standing position by the whole church ; and by singing a translation, in the native language, of the appropriate and affecting hymn, commenced the services immediately connected with the ordinance.

The princess was seated alone on a sofa of crimson silk damask in front of the pulpit. On entering, Mr. Stribling and myself had taken single chairs on one side of the area ; but several of our officers and other foreigners coming in, to make room for them, we took places beside her ; and thus, with one, who we, dear H——, have long regarded with the interest of an adopted child, on my right and a friend who I have learned sincerely to love on my left, I joined with deep feeling in the prayer and in the praise of the little flock here gathered from the gentiles, and partook of the symbols of the “bread of LIFE,” and of “the water of SALVATION”—of which, “if a man eat, he shall live forever,” and “if he drink, he shall never thirst.”

It was an occasion which necessarily called from the pious mind the most devout thanksgiving unto God for the rich displays of his grace here made, while it elicited the most ardent prayer that thus, He “who is mighty to save,” would go “forth conquering and to conquer !” The most unreflecting and incredulous mind could not have looked upon the scene, without admiration at the achievements of decorum and seeming piety which, at least, it must be acknowledged, have been accomplished. The number of communicants was near two hundred—all natives with the exception of Mr. Stribling and myself, and the mission family—presenting in their deportment and whole appearance, as great a degree of intelligence, devotion and entire respectability, as any ordinary church in our country: the chiefs, by the superiority of their air, and greater richness of attire, corresponding well to the higher classes in our own communities, and the common people differing scarce in any respect, but in their color, from those of the same standing at home.

The happiness to me, of thus surrounding the table of our common Lord, with most of my old associates and missionary friends, and with so many of the chiefs and people, whose spiritual welfare has long been a topic of the deepest interest and prayer, was exceedingly great; and filled my heart with gratitude and praise.

The princess appeared to remarkable advantage. I could not avoid noticing with satisfaction, the singular propriety of her dress—a white Italian crape, finished with simple bindings of white satin, worn over an underdress of white, with a becoming bonnet of light silk, and French scarf of the same, of modest color. She was not only serious, but affected to tears by the ordinance; and while I could but believe her a truly sincere and firm professor, my prayer was that she might be “steadfast, unmovable, and always abounding in the work of the Lord.”

LETTER XVI.

DETRACTION AND CALUMNY OF FOREIGN RESIDENTS.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Port of Honolulu, }
November 3d, 1829. }

A SHORT time after the arrival of our ship at Honolulu, Captain Finch and myself were invited to dinner by an American resident of respectability.

While at table, the character of the young king became a subject of conversation ; and the Captain was led to inquire, whether any person had yet been spoken of as a suitable companion for him as future queen of the Islands. Our host replied, that the king and his sister, the princess, were mutually and strongly attached, and that they themselves and all the chiefs wished a marriage to take place between them, according to former usages in the royal family, but were prevented by the missionaries : adding that the ceremony, however might as well be performed, for, it was well known, that they were already living in a state of licentiousness and incest !

As you may readily imagine the boldness of this assertion, which I was persuaded was utterly false, caused me to drop my knife and fork, with a surprise bordering on indignation ; and to demand, in a manner sufficiently indicative of the feeling which had flashed through me, whether Mr. — believed the assertion to be true ? To which he replied, "most assuredly nothing is more notorious—every body knows it !" while two other Americans at the table,

These gentlemen were perfectly aware of the attitude in which I stand to the princess. They knew, that from the time of my first arrival, as a missionary, in 1823, she—then a child eight years old—had been a resident at the station that I occupied in Maui; had ever been a favorite pupil; and on the death of a converted and pious mother, the late queen Keopulani, had been committed by her to the special guardianship and watchful care of the Rev. Mr. Richards my colleague, and myself. They knew, that from that period, I had regarded her with peculiar attachment; had rejoiced in her acquirements; in the early development of more than ordinary Christian principle and feeling; and in the active and exemplary life of piety which she had led; and that a new bond of interest existed, in an evidence of affection given by her on the necessary removal of myself and family from the island, by the assumption, as a favorite and baptismal appellation, of the name of one justly dear above others to me. They knew also, that she has been for three years a member in full communion of the church; stands conspicuous as a Christian, not only in her own nation, but by report, in various parts of the world; and that by impugning her character, they were assailing the veracity and honor of the whole mission, and casting reproach on all the moral achievements, it is reported, to have attained.

Courtesy therefore to me as a guest, and a regard for my feelings; in view of my relation to the princess, and the strong sympathy which I might be known still to feel in all that affects my former associates, should have deterred Mr. ——— and his friends for the time at least, from such unqualified defamation, whether unfounded or not; and it could not have been expected by them, that after hearing it, I should not take measures to ascertain its truth and origin.

The object must have been to force the belief on the mind of Captain Finch, by the confidence and publicity of the assertion, that it must be true. How far this was successfully accomplished the sequel will show.

On taking leave of the company, I requested Captain Finch to charge his mind with the remarks made, and the positiveness of the accompanying manner, that when he should have an opportunity of ascertaining the innocence of the princess, he might be persuaded, from his own observation, of the recklessness with which one, under the influence of strong prejudice and ill will, could thus scatter "arrows, firebrands, and death!" and then say, "am I not in sport?"

To make the assurance of my own mind "doubly sure," I early ascertained, to my perfect satisfaction, that the crimination was as false in fact, as it was heinous in its nature.

From my messmates, and other officers of the Vincennes, I early learned that the same tale had been repeated, by different persons, to them; and shortly after reaching Maui, one of my companions incidentally mentioned the scandal to Mr. Richards, as a matter of common report at Oahu. He immediately inquired of me, whether I had heard any thing of the kind ; and on relating to him the reiterated and positive avowal of Mr. — and his companions, determined, as pastor of the particular church of which the princess is a member, to demand of Hoapiri, governor of Maui, and his wife, the guardians and adopted parents of Harieta, an investigation of the case. The consequence was, an immediate resolution on the part of the governor and princess, to proceed to Oahu to meet the allegation ; and demand, in the name of the government, from the persons implicated, proof or a recantation of the charge.

The princess was so much affected by the calumny, as to be unable to sleep or eat ; and remained with the Governor and his wife, during the whole of the night on which she first heard of it, bathed in tears ; and it was not without much urging by the mission family and myself, and the reiterated assurance, that all the gentlemen with me believed her perfectly innocent, that she could be induced to meet them, in the free and cheerful manner she had, previous to this disclosure.

All, who heard of it, were exceedingly indignant. And the first shade of sadness I had seen pass over the brow of Kaahumanu, after the arrival of the Vincennes, was on the morning of our return from Maui, after she had been informed of it. As I approached her residence, to exchange with her an "aloha," I perceived her seated in dejection on one side of the apartment, while several of her compeers were partaking of a tempting breakfast just by. On asking her why she did not eat with the rest, she replied, "aohe ono ke ai!" "There is no sweetness to the food!" and on inquiring why? and whether she was ill? was answered, that her "heart was broken by the wickedness of the foreigners, and the falsehood of their words!"

A general council was early assembled for the consideration of this subject. Governor Boki had previously called on Mr. —, to know why he had made such a statement. The only satisfaction he could obtain was, that Mr. — did not intend to convey the impression that he himself believed the charge true, but only that it was said by others to be so, and was generally believed to be a fact. He could, however, furnish no particular authority; and the following correspondence between the Chiefs and Captain Finch has just taken place.

The document from the chiefs was placed in the hands of Captain Finch, by the queen regent, Kaahumanu, in presence of the signers in open council yesterday.

LETTER OF THE CHIEFS.

Honolulu, Oahu, October 30, 1829.

Listen to us, Captain Finch. Great is our affection for you; united with pleasure, admiration, and confidence for the love which you have shown us. On account of your affection for us, we rejoice in this opportunity to tell our thoughts.

This is our sentiment concerning Mr. — dwelling in our islands, Mr. — and —. Many evil deeds have been committed by our people towards them, and many also have been their evil doings towards us ; on account of their prolonging their residence on these islands of Hawaii, we are exceedingly ensnared and burdened by them. Formerly our difficulties were small, but latterly they are very great, on account of the unprovoked injuries that have been heaped upon us, by the above mentioned foreigners. Many have been the smaller injuries which we have received from them ; and which are too many to number. We will only specify two of greater importance.

The first is concerning our man who shot a cow. The two — united, seized upon the man, bound him with a rope, and dragged him along behind their horses, as a horse drags along a cart. Thus they dragged him for the distance of two miles, until he barely escaped with his life.

The second charge is concerning the false and evil report of these persons concerning the princess Harieta. We deny the allegation made by them— it is not true. On account of the charge brought by them against her, our hearts are broken by the scandal, and we can bear it no longer. Our feelings, however, are relieved by the letter of the chief of America, brought by you, by which we are assured of his affection for us. We have also seen your letter, which bears the same likeness with that of your chief.

Because of the similarity of the sentiments of yourself and your chief, we beseech you, if it is in your power, to bring Mr. — and Mr. — to account for the charge which they two have falsely alleged against the princess. Grant, sir, our request.

that you bring them to a full account here, or be so kind as to tell us distinctly, the proper course that we are to take.

This we humbly beg of you, with great affection, which shall be perpetual.

KAUIKEAUOLI, King.

BOKI, Governor of Oahu.

ADAMS, Governor of Hawaii.

HOAPIRI, Governor of Maui.

HARIETA NAHIENAENA, Princess.

ELIZABETH KAAHUMANU, Regent.

TO THE KING KAUIKEAUOLI, AND THE CHIEFS OF
THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Port of Honolulu, }
November 3d, 1829.

I reply to your letter, and repeat to you that I entertain great friendship for you and your people; as also do the president and government of the United States.

It is painful to me to learn, that you feel you have cause to be offended with my countrymen, Messrs. — and —. They will, or can, I hope, remove it. I have told them of your grievances.

When you, and those of my countrymen who visit or live in your islands, become better acquainted, then all grounds of complaint may cease on both sides. As they and you are yet in some degree mutual strangers, it is most judicious to exercise forbearance toward each other.

I have not power to give you such satisfaction as you may think is deserved; but I will receive, and deliver to the president, such demands or representations as you may choose to make ; and they will be effectually attended to.

As you are at a loss to know how you are to act toward strangers who reside among you, but do not behave as you may think they ought—I recommend to you to propose such questions to my government. It will explain the extent of its protection to citizens who visit, or temporarily sojourn among you ; also the restraints and correctives it can apply to offences committed against you ; and will further inform you of the degree of power or right over them, which it is willing to concede to you.

Whatever ill impressions may have been produced by what Mr. —— and Mr. —— may have said against the princess Harieta, are removed by your denial and assurances ; their remarks probably were not conceived in malice, and may have been derived from your own people. The knowledge that the conversation has given you so much pain, will most probably render them more cautious. When your government is better established, and your people more informed, your characters will be better protected from aspersion.

These are my views and my opinions ; you can however have reference as I before stated, through me to the president, who will confirm them, or else distinctly differ from me ; so that your objects will be attained.

I have thus, conclusively, noticed all the points of your letter upon which I can with propriety touch : and have only to add the fervent wish, that all difficulties, and every sense or feeling of displeasure, may for the present, terminate here.

May each day of your existence, add to the present evidences of your general prosperity, and individual happiness.

W. C. B. FINCH.

As to the assertion, that the king, princess, and chiefs, are all desirous of a marriage between the brother and sister, it is as entirely unfounded as the accompanying calumny. Had not Christianity been introduced and established, these two would doubtless have been united before the present time; but it is now six years since the subject was voluntarily dismissed from the conversation and councils of the chiefs, as one that was forever put at rest by the precepts of the faith they had espoused. In speaking upon this point with the princess, she told me that such a thing had never been intimated to her by any one of the chiefs, except by Boki, when intoxicated, a few weeks since: entering the house at which she was, he told her she must marry her brother immediately; on which, replying that he spoke like a crazy man, from much drink, she left the room. But it was added by her, that Mr. —, an American, and Mr. —, a British resident, had each, at two different times, advised and importuned her to marry her brother—saying, that such alliances were frequent, both in America and England; and that, not long since, a British king had married his sister! Mr. Jones, the American consul, however, she says, told her, that it was not true; that such a marriage was never heard of in a Christian country ; and that to marry her brother would be a lasting disgrace in the eyes of all civilized nations.

I have not entered into this detail, and traced the calumny to its result, from any intrinsic importance in the circumstance itself, nor with the intention, on the one hand, of bringing reproach on the individuals giving rise to it, or on the other, of presenting myself in pledge for the continued integrity, and future fair fame of the person to whom it principally relates.

The princess, for so youthful a professor of religion, is placed in circumstances highly inauspicious to the continuance of that brightness and spirituality of Christian character which she has, thus far, so clearly exhibited—if not hazardous, even to the purity essential to the existence of true piety.

The nation of which she is so conspicuous a chieftain, however humble in comparison with others, and mean in the pretensions of its royalty to rank and splendor, still has "its world" to ensnare the youthful mind, and its pleasures, and its follies, to tempt the inexperienced heart. Of that world, too, she is the idol : its adulations in every form are constantly poured around her ; and unhappily, in the number of those, whose flattery springs only from admiration and sincere attachment, there are others who court but to deceive, and who adulate but to destroy. And however sincerely such an event is to be deprecated, still it is not impossible, to say the least, that she may yet live more deeply to dishonor, even than she has, thus far, adorned the cause, so early espoused by her. But of such an event, it is most devoutly to be said, "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof;" and I cannot but protest against the unmanliness and cruelty of an attempt, thus beforehand, to blast the fair fame of a reputation hitherto unsullied.

The leading motive to the disclosure has been to unfold by the opportunity which it presents, the true fountain of bitterness from which streams of prejudice and misrepresentation, destructive not only to the best interests of this nation, but of the whole heathen world, have been made so widely and so broadly to flow.

It is in cases like the preceding, and on such authority as Mr. — and his friends, that the detractions of the mission are founded, which have been furnished to the world by Captain Beechey, of H. B. M. ship Blossom, by the "Redacteur" of "The Voyage of the Blonde," and by M. Von Kotzebue, of the Russian Imperial Navy, in his "New Voyage Round the World." And I venture to assert that there is not a syllable derogatory to the honor and usefulness of the missionaries, contained in their united accounts, which, on investigation, could not be traced to a similar "deceitful and deceiving" source.

The station of post-captain in the royal and imperial navies of their sovereigns, is in itself an Ægis to the honor of Beechey and Von Kotzebue; and I am far from believing, that the statements they have given are the fabrications of their own minds. Unhappily there is too little necessity for any visitor at the islands, thus to task his inventive powers: an abundance of matter of this description, already manufactured, is there kept in constant store, with tongues ready to retail it ; and, I doubt not, those gentlemen can give the names of the individuals from whom they received all they have rehearsed.

I impeach not their veracity. But unfortunately for them, the attitude in which they have placed themselves, by their publications, is such, that charity herself cannot throw round them a shield, which, in addition to a defence of their honor as gentlemen, will screen their reputation as trust worthy reporters to the world, of the physiology, condition, and prospects of the people they have visited in traversing the globe. A defence of their candor can only be sustained by the sacrifice of the acuteness of their observation, and the faithfulness of their research.

If their accounts of the Sandwich Islands were written in full probity of heart, they must plead guilty to the charge of an error in judgment, and of having become dupes to the arts and misrepresentations of others, in utter neglect of the facilities for personal observation by which they were surrounded. To every intelligent visitor at the same place, it must be self-evident, that instead of filling their note-books with facts passing before them, they caught with eagerness, from strongly prejudiced and ill-disposed men, recitals and hear-says, in direct opposition to them.

It is not with unguarded pen that I advance this opinion. I have myself had a demonstration of the fact ; and can present evidence, both incidental and direct, in support of it, furnished by those who could have no motive to deceive.

A short time previous to my departure from the islands in 1825, I called one morning at the residence of an American merchant, who had the hour before returned to Honolulu from a visit of a day or two, at a place on the western side of Oahu, twenty-five or thirty miles distant. In the course of the conversation which ensued, he expressed great anxiety for the people inhabiting the sections of country through which he had passed, stating, equally to my surprise and regret, that they must in a very short time be in a state of perfect famine, from having been obliged by the chiefs to go into the mountains to cut timber for a new chapel, lately erected at Honolulu, to the neglect of their plantations, till all the growth on them had perished from want of irrigation and other attention : adding, that from this cause, the whole region presented a most melancholy spectacle.

I had no reason to doubt the truth of the report. I knew nothing myself of that part of the island, and was aware that the inhabitants had recently been occupied in procuring timber for the chapel ; having myself, on one morning within a few weeks preceding, counted 2,200 men bearing it into town, in one uninterrupted procession, while some 800 or 1,000 others followed during the day. But their appearance was not that of an oppressed and famishing people ; for they came, evidently in high spirits and joy, with hands and hearts ready to their work, which would scarce have been the case if, on their way, they had beheld their plantations perishing and their crops ruined in consequence of their absence.

Two gentlemen of the mission arrived at Honolulu, the same day of this conversation, from the Leeward Islands. Not having heard the cry of "Sail ho!" among the natives, I expressed my surprise on meeting them, at their getting into the harbor without being discovered; and, in explanation, learned that they had landed in the vessel in which they left Tauai, on the western side of the island, at the same place visited by Mr. —, and had come on foot over the same ground which he had travelled. It occurred to me at once, without informing my friends of the particular reason for the inquiry, to ask what the appearance of the country and plantations in that direction were? They answered that the cultivated parts were in luxuriant and beautiful growth; so much so, that they had repeatedly on the way made the evidence of industry and the fine order in the farms, the subject of remark! I then informed them of the report of Mr. —, which they thought so utterly impossible as to believe me in jest, till assured of the contrary.

Captain Beechey's visit at Oahu occurred some few months after this: and his principal report of the condition of the people is, that they were in a state approaching to utter famine, from habits of indolence induced by the instruction and influence of the missionaries. That they had been taught, that to attend church seven times a day, was all that was necessary for them; and that a native had told him, (in what language and by whose interpretation?) that it was "better to pray than to work;" and the consequence was, that the plantations were going to ruin, and provisions so scarce, that the king, only a few days before, had been obliged to send to the American consul to beg a piece of bread !

Such is the report of Captain Beechey ; while his own ship, and all other vessels in port, were receiving from the native market every refreshment, both animal and vegetable, that they needed or desired. The numerous foreigners resident at Honolulu, were also living in abundance on the same resources ; and a walk of fifteen minutes in the rear of the town, and the ride of an hour in almost any direction, would have shown him thousands and thousands of acres of cultivated growth, as rich and exuberant as any ever known since the first discovery of the islands ! From whence, then, I would ask, did he gain his evidence of famine ? From assertions, no doubt, as well founded as that made by Mr. — to me : and where was the acute observation of the intelligent and scientific voyager ?—brooding, it is probable, in total neglect of the beautiful and fertile valleys around, over the dusty and sunburnt plain east of the port, which he had been told was once covered with flourishing plantations ; without the addition, however, of the time when—a period “to which the memory” of foreign visitors at least “runneth not contrary !”

A few weeks only intervened between the visit of Captain Jones, of the U. S. ship Peacock, and that of Captain Beechey ; yet Captain Jones, whatever he may have heard, saw no evidence of a famine past or to come. On the contrary, for three months he beheld a market daily filled with the productions of the country, in a quantity sufficient for the refreshment of the Peacock and numerous other vessels in the harbor, during the whole period, and at a price more reasonable than at any other port visited by him in the Pacific. In place of a threatened famine from neglect of cultivation, there are the most satisfactory statistical data on record, to show that for years previous to the visit of Captain Beechey to the present time, the increase in vegetable and animal supplies has been more than proportionate to the increase in the number of ships frequenting the group.

Captain Von Kotzebue left the Sandwich Islands on his return to Russia a few days previous to my embarkation for England and the United States, in 1825. In his "New Voyage round the World," after speaking of the missionaries, of their influence and their character, in a very detractive manner, he asserts that my intended departure was occasioned by the injudicious and reprehensible measures of my associates, especially of Mr. Bingham, and by finding the objects for which I had left my country in this manner defeated. I should have been utterly at a loss to conjecture on what authority such an assertion could have been made, but for a fact which had previously come to my knowledge.

While Captain Jones was at Oahu, in 1826, a gentleman, in speaking of me, assigned this same reason for my retirement from the mission; and in support of it mentioned, that he had received a letter from me in which I acknowledged the fact. Only a short time previous, Captain Jones had himself seen a letter, addressed by me from the Georgian

Islands to one of the missionaries, in which sentiments and feelings at utter variance with such a statement were strongly expressed. Of this he informed the gentleman, saying that he should be pleased to see that which I had addressed to him. He promised to show it—but afterwards said it was mislaid, and could not be found. The truth is I never, to the best of my knowledge, addressed a letter to that individual, either before or after sailing from the islands. In connection with this circumstance, it was no difficult task to account for the paragraph in the publication of the voyager. If no other means had been open to him, he would have found better authority on this point in one of the most interesting and polished of his officers, whose parting words after a warm benediction were, "Reminiscaris interdum mei, qui in tua domo familiarum se inter quos habet carissimos, in patria reductum putabat."

Mr. Bingham is the subject of special obloquy in the work of Von Kotzebue; and I should be doing injustice to my heart, not to present in this place my own estimate of his character.

That he is a man of superior intellect, of good education, and of much general and practical knowledge, all acquainted with him must admit, while those who know him best are equally aware of the benevolence and kindness of his heart. His evil, in the eyes of his calumniators can only be an unre-served devotion of all his powers to the enterprise in which he is engaged—the entire conversion, moral renovation, and eternal good of the islanders. For the achievement of this, he spares himself neither by day nor by night, but, in reference to it, is "instant in season and out of season;" and, after a series of exhausting labors from the rising to the setting of every sun, trims the midnight lamp over the construction of books for the schools, and translations from the scriptures for the habitations and closets of the people. He has no policy in his measures not approved by all his associates, and exerts no influence over the chiefs and people differing from that of any other missionary, except such as may arise from a seniority of residence and the ties of long attachment.

Mr. Bingham, however, is not the only individual misrepresented. From the notices of this voyager, the whole of the missionaries are to be regarded as an ignorant and vulgar set of men, unfitted to instruct even the natives in the most common arts. They do not claim for themselves, nor would I claim for them, the name and reputation of accomplished scholars; nor do they affect the wisdom of the philosopher and devotee to science; but all the ordained ministers of their company (by far the greater number in the whole) have received regular, classical, and collegiate educations, and are as well informed, on most subjects, as persons of their profession in any country. They are accurate and intelligent observers of the phenomena occasionally taking place around them, and have furnished articles in such cases, that have been thought worthy the notice of men well known in the circles of science and letters. For amusement and useful information, they have, when on the shore, measured the altitudes of the mountains ; and again when on the summits of these, have taken the bearings of the points of the islands, and from the data, projected maps more accurate than any previously drawn ; and in their various tours for purposes connected with the mission, have furnished to correspondents descriptions of scenery, and notices of the habits and condition of the people, which for beauty and interest will compare with the writings of travelers of reputation.

Such qualifications of mind and of education must at least save them from contempt. But, even, were they less favored in this respect than they are, their principles, their personal example, their influence, and their aim, are such that, whatever the estimate now placed upon them may be, I am persuaded, that at last they will be accounted in the number of those of whom "the world was not worthy ;" and the drapery which M. Von Kotzebue has cast round me, as standing in his work in relieve to such men, instead of a mantle of kindness, must ever be esteemed by me, a BADGE OF REPROACH.

LETTER XVII.

GOVERNMENT DEBT AND STATE OF COMMERCE.

U. S. ship Vincennes, port of Honolulu, }
November 3d, 1829. }

ON Saturday the whole mission family were entertained on board the Vincennes. Captain Finch, after receiving the ladies, and welcoming them to his cabin, was obliged to excuse himself, and, with Mr. Bingham as interpreter, go on shore to meet the king and Governor Boki in a private conference respecting the claims of the American merchants upon the native government—to secure payment of which, he had tendered his services, through the American consul, to the respective houses interested.

The interview continued the greater part of the day; and, on returning to the ship in the evening, he expressed great regret, that I could not have been with him. The development of native intellect, and evidences of a capacity for the management of financial and governmental affairs, exhibited on this occasion, he considers decidedly the most interesting that have yet come under his notice.

He was greatly delighted with the dignified and business-like manner in which the king, as well as Boki, entered upon the exposition of their commercial relations; and with the intelligence and ability of both, in the discussion of the subject, during the interview. From Mr. Bingham I learn, that the captain improved the opportunity of giving the king much important advice, as a private friend, in reference to his fiscal affairs: urged upon him the importance of keeping himself and government free from pecuniary embarrassments, of having a treasurer qualified to preserve his accounts, in an intelligible manner, &c. &c.

The conference was resumed yesterday morning, in the presence of all the chiefs; and an investigation of accounts took place, which resulted in the acknowledgment of about $50,000 due, to different American merchants and ship masters, with a pledge, on the part of the chiefs, to liquidate the whole within the ensuing nine months. The debts are principally those contracted by the late king Riho Riho, and by Taumuarii of Tauai previous to his death.

Sandal wood, for the payment of the same claims, was collected after the visit of Captain Jones, but appropriated by Boki to new purchases, without the knowledge of the regent and king. The payment now to be made is also to be in sandal wood, and Maaro of Maui, who accompanied Gov. Hoapiri and the princess to Oahu, has already, by the application of his arithmetic to the case, assessed the amount requisite, on the different Islands, according to the population and quantity of wood on each, to be collected by a general tax.

An American merchant, now in business at Honolulu, and who was here previous to the arrival of the missionaries in 1820, informs me, that the advance in the commercial importance of the islands within the ten years past, has not been less than seven hundred per cent. Upon this point, however, I will refer you to the following official letter of Mr. Jones, addressed to Captain Finch.

United States Consulate, Sandwich Islands, }
Honolulu, Oahu, October 30th, 1829. }

Dear Sir,

In your communication of the 19th inst., received at this Consulate, you have requested me to give you such information as I may be possessed of, relative to the state, extent, value, and wants of the American commerce of these islands, in consequence of the government of the United States having evinced a lively interest for its better protection, and more successful prosecution.

In complying with this request, I shall endeavor to be as concise as possible; and give you such information only, as shall be conceived most desirable for our government to be informed of. Since the discovery of the Whale Fishery on the coast of Japan, and the independence of republics of the western coast of North and South America, the commerce of the United States at the Sandwich islands, has vastly increased; of such importance have these islands become to our ships, which resort to the coast of Japan for the prosecution of the whale fishery, that without another place could be found possessing equal advantages of conveniences and situation, our fishery on Japan would be vastly contracted or pursued under circumstances the most disadvantageous.

The importance, also, of the Sandwich islands to ships bound from the western coast of North and South America to China, or Manilla, has of late years, been fully tested ; the number of such vessels, which visit these Islands, is annually increasing, and they have been found to afford them every advantage for repairing, refreshment, &c.—and, generally, a market for parts of cargoes, which such vessels commonly have remaining unsold at the time of leaving the coast of Western America ; these vessels also generally obtain from the islands a freight of sandal wood, either for Canton or Manilla, which is quite an inducement, of itself, to attract them to these isles.

The commerce of the United States, which resorts to the Sandwich islands, may be classed under five heads, viz. : First, Those vessels which trade direct from the United States to these islands, for sandal wood, and from hence to China and Manilla, and return to America. Second, Those vessels which are bound to the Northwest Coast on trading voyages, for furs, and touch here on their outward bound passage, generally winter at these islands, and always stop on their return to the United States, by the way of China. Third, Those vessels, which on their passage from Chili, Peru, Mexico, or California, to China, Manilla or the East Indies, stop at these islands for refreshments, or repairs, to obtain freight, or dispose of what small cargoes they may have left. Fourth, Those vessels which are owned by Americans resident at these islands, and employed by them in trading to the Northwest Coast, to California and Mexico, to Canton and Manilla. Fifth, Those vessels, which are employed in the whale fishery, on the coast of Japan, which visit semi-annually.

Of the first class of vessels, which visit these islands annually, the number may be estimated at six, the amount of tonnage, eighteen hundred, and the value of vessels and cargoes, at three hundred and twenty thousand dollars. Of the second class, the number may be estimated at five, the tonnage one thousand and the value of vessels and cargoes, two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Of the third class, the number may be estimated at eight, the tonnage two thousand five hundred dollars, and the value of vessels and cargoes, at five hundred thousand dollars. Of the fourth class, the number may be estimated at six, the tonnage one thousand, and the value of vessels and cargoes, two hundred thousand dollars. Of the fifth class, the number may be estimated at one hundred, the tonnage, thirty-five thousand, and the value of vessels and cargoes, at four millions. Thus making the commerce of the United States, which annually visits the Sandwich Islands, amount to one hundred and twenty-five vessels, estimated at forty thousand tons, and valued at five millions two hundred and seventy thousand dollars. This estimate is made from the average number of vessels, which have visited these islands during the last three years; and will, I believe, be found to be very near the extent and value of our commerce here.

The importance of the Sandwich Islands to the commerce of the United States, which visits these seas, is, perhaps, more than has been estimated by individuals, or our government been made acquainted with. To our whale fishery on the coast of Japan, they are indispensably necessary ; hither those employed in this business repair in the months of April and May, to recruit their crews, refresh and adjust their ships ; they then proceed to Japan, and return in the months of October and November. It is necessary that these ships, after their cruise on Japan, should return to the nearest port ; in consequence, a large majority resort to these islands, certain here to obtain any thing of which they may be in want ; a small proportion, however, of these vessels have proceeded for supplies and refreshments, in the fall, to the ports on the coast of California ; but as the government of Mexico have now imposed a duty of two dollars and one eighth per ton, on every ship, that shall anchor within their waters, whether in distress or otherwise, this will, of course, prevent our whale ships from visiting that coast, and the Sandwich Islands, will then remain as the only resort for them, after their cruise on the coast of Japan.

As the government of the Republics of South America become settled, and peace established on their shores, our commerce, with these nations, will undoubtedly increase, and the result will, of course, have a tendency to bring more commerce to the islands ; here, all vessels bound to China, Manilla, or the East Indies, will stop on their passage, and the more the advantages which these islands afford to such vessels, are known, the more they will become frequented.

When we reflect, that only a few years since, the Sandwich Islands were not known to exist—when but lately they were visited only by a few ships bound to the Northwest Coast of America, and these merely stopping to purchase a few yams or potatoes, and that now there annually come to this remote corner of the globe, forty thousand tons of American shipping, with the sure prospect, that in no long protracted period, this number will double, we are led to conclude, that the Sandwich Islands will yet be immensely more important, to the commerce of the United States, which visits these seas, than they have been.

You, Sir, will have seen at this part of Honolulu, a little of the extent and importance of our commerce, and you will be able to form some estimate of the advantages which these islands afford ; and it is hoped you will conceive it proper, to urge on our government, the necessity and propriety of extending a strong arm of protection to those citizens, who adventure to this remote part of the world. I say protection—for I conceive so large a commerce, and so far removed from the laws and restraints of civilized society, requires to be regulated by the appearance, if not the actual force of power.

The annual, if not semi-annual, visit of one of our ships of war, to these islands, is conceived to be necessary ; and would, no doubt, be attended with the best advantages, affording to our commerce in these seas, protection, assistance, and security.

For this station, a sloop of war would be sufficient for every purpose required ; and, if so arranged as to visit these islands in the months of March, April, and May, and again in October and November, every desired object would then be effected, and the result be, that our merchantmen, and whalers would come to the islands with perfect security ; their tarry here made safe, and many abuses and inconveniences with which they are now shackled, would be done away. The very knowledge that a ship of war would semi-annually be at the Sandwich islands, would be of infinite service to our commerce in general, which enters the waters of the North Pacific ocean.

Since my residence on these islands, as an officer of government, I have, repeatedly, in the discharge of my official duties, felt the want of protection and aid, from the power of my government. I have been compelled to see the guilty escape with impunity ; the innocent suffer without a cause ; the interests of my countrymen abused ; vessels compelled to abandon the object of their voyage, in consequence of desertion and mutiny ; and men, who might be made useful to society, suffered to prowl amongst the different islands, a disgrace to themselves and their country, and an injury to others whom they are corrupting and encouraging to do wrong. From such sources, our commerce, in this quarter of the world, has suffered much ; and I have the confidence to believe that the regular visits of our ships of war, to these islands, (their commanders being clothed with sufficient power to act) would have the best tendency to regulate all things and secure to our commerce in this quarter every thing of which it now so importantly feels the want.

I would suggest to yourself the propriety of recommending to our government that a ship of war be detached for the protection of American commerce in these waters, that she be required annually to visit the Society and Marquesas Islands, and, semi-annually, the Sandwich Islands; that in the intermediate periods when she might not be employed at such islands it shall be required that she visit the ports of California and Mexico, to afford protection to our commerce, and citizens in that quarter, where they have for a long time been suffering under the abuses of an ill-regulated government.

I might point out to you many more, and important reasons, why our commerce in these waters requires more protection—they are constantly coming under my observation, and I daily see the propriety and necessity that our government should act as I have suggested to you; but I will forbear to trouble you longer with this report, which, though superficial, I hope will (with information you may obtain from other sources) be sufficient to answer the object for which you addressed me on the 19th inst.

Be pleased to accept for yourself the assurance of the respect and esteem with which

I am,

Sir,

LETTER XVIII.

A RIDE TO THE COUNTRY HOUSE OF GOVERNOR BOKI, AND EVENING ENTERTAINMENT BY THE KING.

U. S. ship Vincennes, Port of Honolulu, }
November 5th, 1829. }

AT the close of the commercial transactions on Monday, Governor Boki informed Captain Finch and myself, that the king, princess, and queen regent, were to spend the next day with him and Madam Boki, at a cottage occupied by them in the valley of the Nuuanu, directly inland from the port—adding that he should be happy to see us, and any of the officers who might choose to take the ride, en famille with them. A trip to the celebrated Pari or Pass of Kolau, within a couple of miles of the residence of the governor, being yet an unaccomplished object with us, we readily accepted the invitation; and a delightful day indeed, it proved to be.

The captain, Lieutenant Stribling, and myself, landed immediately after breakfast. My companions were supplied with horses by Mr. Jones and Mr. French; and I, through the kindness of the owner, with a beautiful animal, the property of Madam Halileo, wife of the king's private secretary. The palace yard had been appointed as a place of rendezvous with the chieftains; and, on mounting, we rode there to join them.

The regent, among other equipages, has a handsomely finished and expensive gig of foreign manufacture. She made great use of it till the occurrence, lately, of a disaster or two, when taking the air in it. On one occasion, in driving herself in the vicinity of her country house at Manao, absorbed in more important musings, she did not sufficiently regard the narrowness of the road on the bank of a taro patch, filled with mud and water; and found her portly figure very suddenly transferred, without much regard to the manner, or attitude in which she was left, from the height of her vehicle into the mire below; and not long afterwards, General Kekuanaoa, in acting the beau to her, gave a practical demonstration of the readiness with which the centre of gravity of a high gig, containing two nobles of three hundred pounds each, may be shifted in turning a corner in the true style of James street. In both cases her majesty escaped material injury; but since these events, she has been content with a more unpretending establishment—a little, low car of green, with two wheels, drawn by a pair of shaggy, gray donkeys, driven tandum, with a harness of undressed goat skin.

On the present occasion, as the road in some parts is not well fitted for wheels, she chose to dismiss the donkeys, and to commit her safety, in the draught of the barrow, to bipeds, who could be managed by word of mouth, without hazarding the uncertainty of the rein; and on our arrival at the palace, we found her already seated, under an umbrella, in her vehicle, with six or eight stout islanders in readiness to transport her up the valley, and a numerous train on foot, bearing the various appendages of her service.

The princess, in a black dress, with a mantle of scarlet satin, and white silk hat, trimmed with flowers, rode a spirited black horse, with Maaro, her secretary, and a dozen others of her household and followers in company ; while the king was mounted on a noble charger of iron gray, and surrounded by a suite of twenty-five or thirty chieftains and favorites, on fine and well equipped horses. Captain Finch, Mr. Stribling, and myself, made up the number—forming a cavalcade of fifty on horseback, while as many accompanied us on foot, to bear water flagons, &c., and to take charge of the horses in dismounting.

By ten o'clock we were all in readiness ; and as we issued from the yard, through the gate opening in the rear upon the country, presented, in our various groupings and equipments, no little of the aspect, for this part of the world at least, of a royal party, on an excursion of pleasure.

The morning was delightful ; the heavens of the finest blue, and the sun, though bright, not oppressive, with the trade-wind blowing freshly from the mountains in our faces. All things without, and seemingly all within, joined to produce a flow of spirits the most buoyant and cheering. Our horses, full of nerve and muscle, partook in no small degree of the excitement of feeling ; and, impatient of even the slight restraint we had any disposition to impose on them, pranced gaily over the swelling grounds at the foot of Fort Hill, as we wound round it to the entrance of the valley : the restiveness of some—among others those of the king and his immediate escort—being such as to lead their riders occasionally to diverge from the direct road ; and, by taking a sweep of half a mile with unchecked rein, to reduce them to a degree of sobriety, better suited to the convenience of the general retinue.

The king is exceedingly fond of the exercise of riding, and is an accomplished horseman. In his whole air and attitude, and in the ease and gracefulness of his movements, he need scarce shun a comparison with the most admired of the Spanish caballeros, seen on the coast. He has been instructed by a skillful English groom, still in his service ; and owns a stud of more than a hundred horses. It is said, that much of the ease and gracefulness of his manners is attributable to his fondness for riding, and to his mastery of the manly accomplishment.

On reaching the first stream of water—that which comes from the valley of Ua—and the stone walls inclosing the plain, we had a specimen of the facility with which royalty here, as well as in more noble nations, triumphs over obstacles of importance in the movements of inferior persons. Neither the rocky banks nor bed of the mountain torrent, nor the substantial stone barrier on the opposite side, impeded for a moment the chariot wheels of the regent ; and she sat most composedly in her equipage, while it was dashed down one steep bank, and over the rocks at the bottom of the stream—one wheel, at one moment, poising high in the air, and the other equally so at the next—then up the opposite side, and straight over a wall three or four feet high.

After passing the front of the hill, in which the spur of mountain, dividing the two valleys, Ua and Nuuanu, terminates towards the port, we came to the principal stream flowing down the latter, and at which is the commencement, at present, of a fine turnpike road, now making by Boki, from the harbor to the Pari. The sides of the hills on either side are excavated sufficiently to give room for two carriages to pass; and a substantial bridge is to be thrown across the water. For some cause, which we did not ascertain, it is carried on in detached parts, here and there—in no place more than a mile in continuance—but promising when completed to make as beautiful a drive, as could be desired in any part of the world; and a work that will do much credit to the government, and add greatly to the resources of pleasure among the residents and visitors at Honolulu.

After crossing this stream, and mounting the opposite bank, the ascent for several miles is gradual—affording extensive views, on either hand and towards the sea, of the rich plantations with which the mouth of the valley is filled. Here our company presented a lively and animating spectacle. Where the new road had been laid out and completed, we dashed on en masse over its broad, gravelly surface, followed by a long line of pedestrians, exhibiting every variety in the color and form of their costume; but, where the original paths, diverging from one another, and winding in different directions, were only to be found, we became divided into separate parties, cantering in long lines of single file over hil lock and through dingle, first on one side of the valley and then on another, till, at the end of three or four miles, we came again upon a stretch of the road just on the battle ground, where the victory of Tamameha, over the king of Oahu, about thirty-five years ago, decided the fortunes of that successful warrior, and made him monarch of the group.

Here Kauikeauoli, with several of the more intelligent of his companions, had drawn up; and waited the arrival of the captain, who was in company with the princess, in order to acquaint him with the historical interest of the ground, and to point out the stations of the respective parties, their numbers, and the character and issue of the contest. The group presented, as we gathered round him to listen to his statement, connected with the scene in the history of the islands which has imparted its interest to the ground, would have afforded a subject scarce beneath the pencil of a master, while it told a tale, by the contrast of its parts thus brought together in the passing exhibition, and by imagination of that long since gone by, worthy of a place on canvas.

In the centre was the youthful sovereign, such as I have described him—of fine figure and easy manners, in a handsome riding suit, and mounted on a noble animal of a species, the name of which had probably never here been heard, on the day of this decisive battle—descanting, while his eye sparkled with intelligence and interest in the theme, on the feats of the savage ancestor who had secured to him his dominion. By his side, in the attire of an elegant female, and equally well mounted, was his sis ter—sharing no little in the animation of his narrative—while clustered round, on horseback, were forty or fifty chosen friends and companions, with every appearance, in the dress and manners of the whole, of no contemptible degree of civilization, and even refinement. With this group in your eye for a foreground, dear H——, fill up the picture in the wild glen with thousands of a savage race in all the fury of a deadly conflict—foe struggling in nakedness with foe, while barbarous menaces and hideous shouts, amidst the brandishment and hurling of spears and war clubs, add to the terrors of the sight. And, when the piece is thus sketched, would you imagine, that the figures of the foreground and those of the filling up are people of the same race?—of the same age?—and almost of the same quarter of a century? Would you believe the civilized and Christian brother and sister—the eldest scarce sixteen—to be the son and the daughter of the most fearful of the leaders of the savage horde? Yet such is the fact; and such the strength of contrast, which the changes of little more than thirty years here present.

At this spot, the beauty and magnificence of the mountain scenery of the valley becomes striking; but, for its characteristic features, and for a description of the sublime spectacle exhibited at the Pari or precipice itself, I must again say to you—See Stewart's "Residence in the Sandwich Islands."

Less than two miles from the battle ground, brought us, by a fine stretch of turnpike, down a gentle hill, to a grove of acacia, surrounding the temporary abode of Boki—a rural and refreshing spot, on a slight elevation near the road side, beneath the shade of some beautiful trees, and within hearing of the rumbling of numerous mountain torrents, and the dashing of a distant cascade. The governor designs to build a country house at this place; but the present establishment is merely an encampment in booths, for himself and household, while he is superintending the construction of the road. The principal building, a little cottage or rather tent of poles, scarce twelve feet square, thatched with the green and shining leaves of the dracæna, stands on a terrace of sward, some feet above the level of the ground in front. It is chiefly intended as a shelter in sleeping; the terrace itself, in the shade of the grove, presenting a more inviting place for all other purposes. This, just strewn with fresh fern leaves, and spread with mats, was the reception room to which Madam Boki, in a handsome dress, and head tastefully crowned with flowers, gave us a most cordial welcome, followed by a presentation of boquets. Every thing around was admirably suited to refresh and delight us; and two or three hours past rapidly after our ride, in lounging and in conversation, while we were served with fruit and wine.

Captain Finch, Mr. Stribling, the princess, three or four of her train, and myself, then rode to the Pari, two miles farther up the glen; and after enjoying with great admiration the magnificence of its scenery, returned to a dinner which we had been apprised was in preparation. This was spread in china and glass, in the centre of the green booth described, on a mat upon the ground ; and when summoned to partake of it, each was left to his choice, between the attitude of a Turk and a Roman, during the meal. The regent, princess, and king, with his private secretary Halileo, were the only persons besides ourselves and hosts, admitted to the entertainment. It consisted of a dish of baked fish, at the head, before the governor ; a pig at the foot, carved by the secretary ; a plate of chickens on one side in the middle, and a brace of wild fowl opposite, with four round dishes at the corners, two containing a mixture of pork and taro tops cooked together, and two, potatoes and taro as vegetables ; while a large sallad dish, filled with delightful water-cresses from the springs around, occupied the centre—the beverage being the finest mountain water, with Madeira, claret, and muscadine wines. All the cooking was in the native style—in an oven of heated stones ; and each article was spread on its respective dish, in the inner coat of the leaves in which it had been baked.

We greatly relished a repast so well prepared, and so neatly served. After the meats were removed, Madam Boki drew the casters and sallad bowl near her, as I at first supposed, to give us a specimen of her tact in sallad dressing ; but, on seeing a servant approach with a parcel handsomely done up in green leaves, dripping with water, and observing a smile of archness playing on the features of her ladyship as she received it from him, I began to suspect it was only in preparation for some bonne bouche, peculiarly epicurian in its character. Such it proved to be ; for on carefully untying it, while her eye bright ened more and more with pleasantry, she suddenly scattered the contents—a quantity of live shrimp, as pure and transparent as could be, and as sprightly as crickets—over the cresses, and dashing the cruet of vinegar upon the whole, caught up a half dozen of the delicate creatures in the leaves of the sallad, and tossed them, with a laugh, into her mouth, by way of encouragement to us to join in the course. The captain is too courteous a gentleman to stop short of any civility due to the lady of the house; and considering this a kind of challenge, went through the movement of taking a similar quantity in his fingers, and in raising it to his mouth, whether with the intention of following the example farther or not I cannot say, but—in ruse or not—I saw one, at least, of the nimble fry, hop fairly down his throat.

Our return, towards night, to the town, was as delightful as the ride in the morning had been; and the day was pleasantly closed at the mission house, where the band had been ordered from the ship, for the serenade of an hour or two.

The dîner de champêtre of Governor Boki was followed, last night, by an entertainment by the king. The invitations to Captain Finch, and the officers in general, were in writing, and brought on board by the private secretary. Seven o'clock was the hour appointed, but it was past eight before all the company—consisting of the principal chiefs, most of the missionaries, both ladies and gentlemen, including the Rev. Mr. Whitney, and Mrs. Whitney, who arrived from Tauai a few days since, and as many of the officers of the Vincennes as could leave the ship at the same time—had assembled. The palace was well lighted, the company well dressed, and with the band from our ship playing at the entrance, the general effect was quite equal to that of the morning levee.

At nine o'clock we became seated at a supper-table, handsomely laid in China and glass for thirty-five or more, with dishes and covers of silver plate: the king occupied the head, and Madam Boki, as the matron of his household, the foot of the table; while Captain Finch was placed in the centre, on one side, between the princess and queen regent, with Governor Boki and Mr. Bingham, as interpreter, opposite. The princess returned the compliment of the captain, in wearing her feather cape at the examination, by exhibiting upon her neck on this occasion—in addition to a dress of white satin, richly embroidered with gold, and a lofty, becoming toque of crimson and white gauze, elegantly arranged and finished—an exquisitely wrought gold chain of the manufacture of Panama, which he had presented to her as a mark of private respect and friendship. To the king he had given, in the same manner, a large and handsomely-framed print of the Declaration of Independence, by Colonel Trumbull, which, I was pleased also to see, occupying a conspicuous place in the apartment.

The entertainment consisted of three courses: first, cold meats, ham and tongues sliced, with biscuit, and butter, &c.; second, coffee and tea, with different kinds of cake; third, fruits, melons, bananas, grapes, &c., with cider, and a variety of wines. In this last article, however, his majesty had suffered an imposition from his wine merchant in the village, that extended to his guests ; for while he had ordered the best in store, and had paid an exorbitant price, as Governor Boki informed us, notwithstanding a great show of seals and marks, as if from the cellar of a genuine bon-vivant, it was, for the most part, a villainous manufacture. This, however, was no drawback to the enjoyment of the evening, and it was near twelve o'clock before, serenaded by the band, we pulled off to the ship.

SECOND VISIT TO LAHAINA.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, off Hawaii, }
Nov. 11th, 1829. }

EARLY after the arrival at Oahu, of the chieftains from Maui and Hawaii, Captain Finch determined to invite them to return to their respective islands, in the Vincennes, with a design of asking the king also to make the voyage.

I acted as interpreter in delivering the invitation. It was highly gratifying to them ; and the general exclamation on hearing it was, "This is indeed a joy-making man-of-war!" Thursday the 5th inst. was the day appointed for the embarkation ; and at four o'clock in the afternoon, the whole company were brought on board by the captain, in a procession of the ship's boats, under a salute of twenty-one guns, returned by the fort ; the Tamehameha having previously fired the same number, as the boats passed her in the harbor.

Were we in the vicinity of a Court Gazette, the notice of the trip, with the names and titles of our royal passengers, would form quite an imposing paragraph. His majesty the king, private secretary, and suite, including the noble whose special duty it is to guard his head, and whose prerogatives extend to the exclusive privilege of awaking his sovereign from sleep, the keeper of the wardrobe, steward of the household, &c., &c. ; her royal highness the princess Harieta, and attendants ; the ex-queens Kekauruohē and Kekauonohi ; Madam Boki, lady of the Governor of Oahu ; their excellencies the Governors of Maui and Hawaii ; Naihé, chief counsellor of state, and lady, &c. &c., with their respective attendants, making in all the goodly number of thirty-six. Mr. Bingham, at the united request of Captain Finch and the king, was also of the party.

Pleasantry aside, however, the whole party was highly respectable in their appearance and demeanor, as well as in their rank. No one, unacquainted with the state of the nation, would have believed the baggage brought on board, previously to the embarkation, to be that of a company of natives ; consisting of highly ornamented and showy traveling trunks, carpet-bags, portmanteaus, writing-desk, dressing-cases, portfolios, bandboxes, &c., the whole in an elegance and good keeping that, set down in advance of the company, before an American or English hotel.

would make the eyes of the landlord glisten; at the assurance afforded by the luggage, of the rank and resources of the owners.

During the voyage, the chiefs were seated at the cabin table, going through all the forms of polished society; changing their dresses for dinner, &c., and exhibiting, in other respects, no little acquaintance with the etiquette of high life. A principal amusement with them, especially in the evening, on deck, was in singing hymns. Of these they are very fond; and have learned to sing so well, especially the king and his sister, that no one can listen to them without interest and pleasure.

On the second evening from Oahu, we arrived at Lahaina. The princess and governor of Maui were to be left here; and the captain, wishing to honor them with a salute, boats were ordered out to carry them on shore, when yet some distance from the anchorage, in the apprehension that we should not be able to drop anchor before sunset, after which time, in our service, it is not customary to fire a salute. The captain himself intended seeing them on shore; and as soon as the boats had pulled ahead of the ship, the compliment was paid, and our probable name and character at once made known by it, throughout the settlement.

The visit was equally a surprise and a joy, both to the missionaries and the people; and I have had the happiness of spending two more days delightfully with them. Yesterday at noon, however, I was called painfully to bid them a final adieu; and we once more took our anchor, from the midst of a fleet of whale ships, and filled away for Hawaii, with a salute, answered by a battery planted near the landing.

Among other tokens of affection and remembrance sent to you, dear H——, I find a letter of the princess, of which the following is a literal translation.

Lahaina, Maui, Nov. 10th, 1829.

Where art thou, my greatly beloved mother, Mrs. Stewart?

I write to you with anguish of heart, that we no more meet in person, and that our eyes no more fall upon each other; though, I believe, that in mind and feelings, we are ever one, and thus dwell together. Still my heart is pained within me.

At the time we met Mr. Stewart, my sorrow of spirit was relieved; but as my eyes fell on his face, my love for you was revived. How shall I express my affection for you, and for your children?

It becomes me to acquaint you with some of my feelings at the present time. I am, externally, among the people of God, and employed in acts of religion, though not perhaps with full purpose of heart. It is, however, my inmost desire forever to repose on the couch of righteousness; and for this I daily entreat the Lord, that he would establish his kingdom in my heart, and grant me his exceeding grace.

My mind is often on passing trifles, but by no means with that intensity of feeling and strong desire with which, I think, my soul is fixed on the ways of piety: I truly feel that my supreme wish is after holiness: but still I perceive that a single day by no means passes without sin. One day my thoughts are fixed on God; another day I am ensnared: and thus it is continually.

These things I say that you may be acquainted with my real character. I think that my inmost spirit seeks after righteousness as my constant companion.

Jane Young (her bosom friend) sends much love to you, with strong regret that she never saw you. She in reality has great affection for you. Again I must express my own affection for you, my beloved friend in the Lord Jesus Christ, who alone can give us life in the world without end. Great love to all your friends and connections.

LETTER XX.

THREE DAYS AT KEARAKEKUA AND KAAVAROA.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, off Hawaii,
November 17th, 1829.

AT mid-day on the 13th, we came to anchor in the memorable bay of Kearakekua. We had the evening before been so near the entrance of it, that the double canoe of Kapiolani, a beautiful boat of the kind, with neatly made canvas sails, and well manned with paddlers, came off and took her ladyship to the shore.

I was very agreeably disappointed in the appearance of the country around this bay. A black and desolate precipice of lava immediately overhangs it; and the village of Kaavaroa, at its base on the left, stands upon a bare platform of the same; but every thing inland, above the cliff, is verdant and refreshing, covered with plantations, groves, and single trees, with a forest beyond, overtopped majestically by Mounaroa in the distance.

Our company remained on board to dinner, and did not disembark till towards evening. The voyage of Governor Adams, as well as that of Naihé and Kapiolani, was to terminate here; and the salute, under which they left, had a most grand effect in the reverberations of the cliffs adjoining. I was one of the number who went on shore with the party, landing in front of Naihé's dwelling, on the very spot at which the unfortunate Cook perished. But a widely different exhibition from the savage and murderous scene of that day awaited our arrival. From a lofty and spacious building, inclosed with a neat court, by a palisade fence and painted gate, our noble friend Kapiolani was seen issuing, in the dress and with the air of a dignified matron at home, her face, at all times amiable and benignant, beaming with joy, as, with outstretched arms, and tears starting in her eyes, she welcomed us with the customary "aloha—aloha!" repeated again and again, in a tone of kindness and warmth, that proved it to come from a bosom filled with hospitality and every generous affection.

This chief, more than any other, perhaps, has won our respect and sincere friendship. She is so intelligent, so amiable, so lady-like in her whole character, that no one can become acquainted with her, without feelings of more than ordinary interest and respect; and from all we had known of her, we were not surprised to find the establishment she dwells in equal, if not superior, to any we had before seen—handsomely arranged, well furnished, and neatly kept, with a sitting room, or hall, in which a nobleman, in such a climate, might be happy to lounge; and bedrooms, adjoining where, in addition to couches which the most fastidious would unhesitatingly occupy, are found mirrors and toilettables fitted for the dressing-room of a modern belle.

It was near tea time, and in the centre of the hall a large table was laid in a handsome service of china; and, after a short stroll in the hamlet, and the rehearsal of the tragedy of Captain Cook's death on the rocks, at the edge of the water into which he fell, we surrounded it with greater delight than I had before experienced, in observing the improvement that has taken place in the domestic and social habits of the chiefs. Kapiolani presided at the tea-tray, and poured to us as good a cup of that grateful beverage, as would have been furnished in a parlor at home; while her husband, at the opposite end, served, to those who chose to partake of them, in an equally easy and gentleman-like manner, a pork steak and mutton chop, with nicely fried wheaten cakes. A kind of jumble, composed principally of eggs, sugar, and wheat flour, made up the entertainment. After the removal of these, a salver with a bottle of muscadine wine, glasses, and a pitcher of water, was placed on the hospitable board. And every day we remained, similar generous entertainment was spread before various parties from our ship.

The satisfaction derived from witnessing these exhibitions of household management and civilized life, was the greater to me from the fact, that with the exception of our ship's company, there was not a white person nearer to Kaavaroa than at Kairua, the residence of Governor Adams, sixteen miles distant. Kapiolani alone was perceived evidently to be the mover and director of the whole.

It was not intended, that the Vincennes should touch at Kairua; and one of the three days we remained at Kearakekua, I appropriated to a visit to Mr. and Mrs. Thurton, at that place. My friends Magruder and Buchanan accompanied me. Kapiolani, with as much cheerfulness, and seeming joy, as if the kindness were in her own favor, appropriated her double canoe, with its compliment of men, to our use in making the excursion—a conveyance altogether better adapted to the trip than any one of the ship's boats.

As it was necessary for us to return the same day, we were off before the dawn of the morning, while the land breeze still blew freshly from the mountains, and the stars twinkled brightly in the sky. Johnston, our kind steward, notwithstanding the unseasonableness of the hour, had given us a cup of coffee before leaving the ship; and seated on mats, covering the elevated platform between the two canoes, with our boat cloaks around us, in conversation and befitting song, we watched cheerily the approach of day, as our light bark,—rising and sinking, with the swell of the dark rollers breaking almost at our side, in masses of foam on the lava-bound shore—glided swiftly forward under the pressure of her sails.

The sunrise views of Mouna Rōa behind, and of Mouna Huararai before, with the uplands of the intervening coast, were highly colored and beautiful—separate from the other inducements, worth the sail to be enjoyed—and with the novelty of our conveyance, and the constantly changing scenes along a thickly inhabited shore, prevented all tedium on our way.

By ten o'clock we had arrived at our destination. The governor was still at Kearekekua, all the chiefs of the place had joined him there—Mr. Bishop and family were at Oahu, and Mr. Thurston's establishment some distance inland, so that our first call was at a storehouse and retail shop of Mr. French, in charge of a China-man. He received us kindly, and furnished us with refreshments of biscuit, preserved ginger, and wine; after partaking which, we directed our course in search of Mr. Thurston. Having heard, from the natives, of our arrival, we soon met him, on his way to guide and welcome us to his dwelling. He was always a favorite associate of mine, when residing at the Islands, and the meeting with himself and with Mrs. Thurston was both cordial and affecting. Their lot is cast truly "in a dry and thirsty land," so far as the immediate location of their residence, and, indeed, of the whole of Kairua is regarded ; still they appeared comfortable and happy in their establishment ; and though alone, in the midst of thousands who, as it were, only yesterday, were lost in heathenism, are cheerfully and successfully pursuing the work to which they have devoted their lives.

In the fore part of the day we walked again into the town ; visited Governor Adams' residence—an American house—of frame, brought over and erected here, well finished, papered, and painted, both without and within, and furnished, in all its rooms, almost exclusively in the European style. We also passed through the chapel—an immense building ; and, when completed four years ago, the finest native structure in the group. Near it, on one side, within a small inclosure, is one object of deep and tender interest—the lowly grave of Mrs. Bishop, the companion of our voyage in the Thames, and our friend and associate ; the first of this mission who has gone to her rest, and the first whose body has taken possession of the grave, in pledge that, even from these distant isles, there yet shall be, "a resurrection of the just."

After a hospitable repast, prepared by Mrs. Thurston, we all—including herself and children—with natives to bear torches, descended into the cave of Ranakira, which opens on their grounds. For a description of this, however, I will refer you to Mr. Ellis' "Tour of Hawaii," in which every object and scene of physical and historic interest in this section of the island, is noticed in a minute, able and interesting manner.

Soon after reascending from the cavern, thankful for this interview for a few hours, it became necessary once more to interchange parting embraces; and joining our native boat, we were safely returned to Kaararoa in time to share in the usual evening entertainments of our kind hosts, Naihé and Kapiolani. The succeeding day was the Sabbath. Since the departure of the Rev. Mr. Ely and family for America, on account of ill health, six months since, this station has been destitute of preaching regularly. Mr. Bingham and Mr. Andrews, who came passengers to this place with us from Lahaina, performed the services of the day at this time. Our worship on board ship was so arranged, that those of the officers who wished it, were at liberty, to be on shore, both in the morning and afternoon.

The principal difference in the appearance of the assemblage of islanders at this, and the other stations we had visited, was in the place of worship—a small grove of trees immediately in front of Naihé's house, paved with a natural bed of smooth lava. The chapel is entirely too small to accommodate the immense congregation that assemble from the opposite side of the bay, and from along the coast many miles below. Not less than five thousand were supposed to be clustered round the preacher and circle of chieftains in the centre of the grove—as quiet, orderly, and seemingly devout, though half at least of the number were seated in the open sun, as if each knew and felt that he was listening for eternity.

A more pleasing and impressive scene can scarce be sketched, than that presented in the dispersion of the audience at the close of the afternoon service. By far the greater portion of the multitude had arrived by water; and shortly after the benediction had been pronounced, without a rude or noisy word or a single impropriety, unnumbered canoes were lunched from every point of the rocky shore, and, receiving their respective complement of passengers, shoved off upon the bosom of the bay filled with bright and happy looks, and spread their white sails in a return to their respective abodes. The evening sun gleamed brightly, and to me joyously, upon the humble fleet; and the whole sight, with its associations of promise in reference to the future and eternal destinies of this race, was so delightful, that I could not avoid counting the canoes as we rowed off to the ship; and though many had already passed out of sight beyond the southern point, and many were yet unlunched, I numbered two hundred and ten, each containing from three to fifteen persons, many of whom were twelve and fourteen miles, and some even a greater distance, from their homes.

Such is the interest and excitement on the subject of religion and of personal piety along the whole coast, and over a good portion of the island, that Mr. and Mrs. Thurston assured me it was literally true, that they were denied the ordinary hours of sleep and eating, by the visits of persons demanding instruction in the way of salvation. Numbers daily crowded their premises for this purpose, not only from their immediate neighborhood, but from regions at a distance—parties traveling on foot many weary miles, and carrying their food with them, to supply their wants while encamped for a few days, or even for a few hours, near the mission-house, their only business the monotonous inquiry, “What shall we do to be saved?”

We were to sail for Oahu again on Tuesday morning before daybreak, and Monday was busily improved by us in visiting the various spots of interest in the neighborhood connected with the voyage and death of Captain Cook—his encampment on the south side of the bay—the heiau, or temple, from which the fence was taken—the cocoanut trees still marked with the shot of the guns from his ships—and the monument of rough lava and inscription to his memory on the spot to which his body was taken after the massacre, left by Lord Byron in 1825. The king took a party of us also—including Mr. Stribling, who is a great favorite with his majesty—in a double canoe to the village of Honaunau, four miles south of Kearakekua, distinguished as the location of the “House of the Gods” and “City of Refuge” so well described in Ellis’ Tour of Hawaii.

In the afternoon all the chiefs, including the wife and daughter of Governor Adams—the former always styled Mrs. Adams by his excellency—Kamakau, long distinguished for piety at Kaavaroa, &c. &c., were entertained on board ship.

One of the most interesting of the party was a tall, venerable, fine-featured old lady, with benignant expression of countenance and head white as silver: she appeared to be eighty years of age, though probably is not so old, and was the wife in her youth of Taraniopu, or Taraiopu, king of the island in the time of Cook, and the great grandfather, on the maternal side, of the present king. Under any circumstances, the sight of an individual thus associated with the discovery of the islands and the fate of the lamented navigator would be interesting ; but facts connected with her recent history rendered it doubly so : she has lived, not only to see the introduction of the religion of salvation in her long benighted country, but has shared, as is confidently believed, its richest blessings in is a member of the church, and has so applied herself to the acquisition of letters, as to be able to read the word of God in her native language, and daily to drink from its pure fountain of the waters of eternal life.

We returned to the shore with the whole party in the evening, and reflected with sincere regret, that we were for the last time enjoying the hospitality of the counsellor and his wife. Fireworks and rockets had been ordered to be exhibited from the ship ; and at the time appointed for them, Kapiolani, Captain Finch, Mr. Bingham, and myself, took seats on a platform of stone at the side of the house next the bay. After the show had ceased, the Captain in preparation for his departure requested Mr. Bingham to express to Kapiolani the very great pleasure his visit to her had afforded him, and to present his warm thanks for the hospitality and kindness he had received—adding that he had not since he left America been entertained more cordially, or felt himself more happy, than under her roof.

She was unwilling to hear even the first part of the acknowledgment; but when the closing sentiment was interpreted, her credulity became utterly shaken, and, limiting the force of his remark, she said, that he must mean, not since he left America, but since he had been among the heathen people of Nukuhiva, and such as the inhabitants were at Tahiti, and at this group. Finding him, however, determined to adhere to the strength of the original expression, she replied to the whole in a pleasant manner by saying, that all the kindness, and all the favor of the visit, had been to herself, to the king and chiefs, and to the whole nation—that he might have had some gratification in the visit, but he could have had no happiness like theirs; “for our happiness,”—she exclaimed, clasping her hands and pressing them to her bosom, as she lifted her eyes glistening with tears to him—“Our happiness is the joy of a captive just freed from his prison!”

Mr. Bingham having some writing to finish before going off to the ship, I remained with him after all the boats had left—Kapiolani having engaged to send us in a canoe, whenever we might wish to go on board. In the room which Mr. Bingham occupied, I perceived some manuscript books in the native language, on a table, and on inquiring what they were, was no little surprised to learn that it was an AUTOBIOGRAPHY of this chief woman, intended to embrace the history of her own life and times; and in which she has proceeded, already, through several interesting and not unimportant chapters.

It was nearly twelve o'clock before Mr. Bingham was prepared to go to the ship. On entering the principal house again, we found the family at evening prayers—presenting, in the strong light of the lamps on a centre table, an impressive and deeply interesting spectacle, amidst the silence reigning on every side at the dead hour of night.

Here again, the farewell I was called to take, was truly painful. The paddlers of the canoe had been roused from their slumbers—other servants had lighted numerous brilliant torches of the candle-nut, tied together in leaves, to accompany us to the water; and I was about giving my parting salutation, when not only Naihè, but Kapiolani also, said, “Aohe mane, aohe mane—makai;” “No! not here, not here—but at the sea side;” and, throwing a mantle around her, attended by her husband, she accompanied us to the surf, where, after many a warm grasp of the hand, and a tearful blessing, she remained standing on a point of rock, in bold relief amid the glare of torch light around her, exclaiming again and again, as we shoved off, “Aloha Mita Tuata—aloha Mita Tuata Vahine—aloha kekapena—aloha kari!” “Love to you Mr. Stewart—love to Mrs. Stewart—love to the captain and love to the king!” while her handkerchief was waved in repetition of the expression, long after her voice was lost in the dashing of the waters, and till her figure was blended, in the distance, with the group by which she was surrounded.

LETTER XXI.

PRIVATE LETTER OF CAPTAIN FINCH TO THE KING.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Port of Honolulu, }
November 21st, 1829. }

AFTER an unusually boisterous passage of two days from Kearakekua, we entered this harbor again on the morning of the 19th inst.

When at sea off Hawaii one evening, Captain Finch, on going into the cabin, found Madam Boki at the writing table, busily occupied with her pen; while the king, at the same time, was dictating a letter to his private secretary. There was no other person in the cabin; and it appeared, from the following notes, that they were improving the opportunity, to express their gratitude for the pleasure of the voyage, soon to be brought to a close by our return to Oahu. I furnish you with a translation of the notes of each.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, November, 1829.

Affection for you all, the officers of this ship of war, and for you, Captain Finch.

Great, indeed, is my gratitude to you, for your excellent attention in conducting us thus far. Very sincere, also, is my commendation of you all; and of the well doing of your people toward us.

Now on account of my affection for you, as you are about to return to your own country, while we shall abide in our own land, with grateful remembrance of you all, I give this testimony of my love to you, Captain Finch, and to the officers of this ship of war. My thoughts bless you.

With sincerest love and joy,

KAUIKEAOULI.

Love to you all, our fellow-travellers on the ocean. You have kindly attended to us, on board your ship, until we have arrived at this part of our country. When you shall have restored us to our own places, then you will leave us entirely—we shall remain with the remembrance of our having traveled together with you all, and our affection for you will be mingled with sorrow.

LILIIHA.

Liliha, “full fed”—by no means misapplied, to judge from the appearance of her ladyship—you recollect, is the original name of Madam Boki. Mr. Bingham, during the voyage, furnished Captain Finch with the interpretation of the names of all the chiefs, some of which I do not remember to have heard before. The most fanciful and most imposing are those of the king, princess, and ex-queen, Ke-kauruohè.

Kauikeaouli literally means, “To hang upon the deep blue sky ;” Nahienaena—the favorite appellation of the princess till the death of her mother—“The raging or inapproachable fires ;” and Ke-kauruohè, “The bamboo grove.” Kaahumanu, “The feather mantle ;” Naihè, “The spears ;” Hoapiri, “The inseparable friend”—from his attachment and companionship with Tamehameha the Great—and Kapiolani, “The celestial captive,” or “Prisoner of Heaven,” are already known to you.

The note from the king received, in answer from Captain Finch, the following judicious and important, private letter of advice.

ISLANDS.

As I am about to depart from your islands, I feel it becoming on my part, (and due to you,) to state, that I shall quit you with feelings of increased interest for your prosperity and advancement, in all matters of general and individual utility. And I avail myself of this occasion to make my acknowledgments for the hospitable reception which the Vincennes has enjoyed, at each of the places under your jurisdiction, where she has touched.

I beg you to permit me to advert again to some topics, upon which I have already addressed you formally, and which I deem of essential consequence to yourself and people—I mean those as to the desertion and the subsequent secretion of mariners from their vessels. I recollect that you have, in a general way, told me that you would try and prevent such abuses. My object is, to suggest some means in aid of those you may have adopted on these points.

It has been clearly shown to you already, and you are so well convinced, that your own good is involved in these practices, that I need not recapitulate the arguments thereon, which I have verbally used.

But I would suggest to you, in lieu of one of your regulations on these subjects, that it will be found more effectual, in the recovery of deserters and fugitives, if you will forbid the receipt of rewards, as now asked by your common people, on the apprehension of such persons ; and the assumption of the expenses by your governments, to be refunded to you alone, by the masters of vessels, on delivery of runaways.

As the common people are now, in the expectation of obtaining rewards for services in these cases, it is believed to be a practice with them to entice sailors ashore, and to secrete them for awhile, only to betray them ultimately when remuneration is offered.

A regulation forbidding, also, your people, (under some penalty in money or produce,) from harboring, or sheltering and feeding sailors, straying idly in the country, for any time, without occasional obvious and useful employment, will also be beneficial.

I would further recommend to you to forbid masters of vessels from discharging or permitting men to leave their vessels in your harbors. Should they persist in doing so, I would not allow supplies to be carried to them. If men are discharged, it ought to be with your knowledge and concurrence. I think masters of vessels will comply with your wishes in these respects, when distinctly communicated to them.

All sick sailors, left on shore, should be taken care of by the consuls, or owners, or agents of vessels to which they belong ; and as soon as sufficiently recovered, ought to be returned to their respective vessels, or sent by the consuls or agents, in other conveyances, to their several countries, or entered on board such vessels as may want, or may accept their services.

The regent, Kahumanu, once asked me, what a consul had to do here? I will again answer, to take care of our general shipping interest; that he has his orders from the government; that his duties are cautiously defined; and he ought not to be interfered with, except by application or reference directly from yourself to the president.

In the enactment of all laws or regulations, I think it will be for your benefit, and the good of all persons, if you will ask the advice and opinions of all the foreigners resident at the islands, in whom you have confidence. They will no doubt accord it. If they do not, then you should frame the best laws which your knowledge will enable you to do; conforming, as far as possible, to what has always been the common law or usages of the land; and if, on trial, you find them unsuited or oppressive, alter them to suit circumstances. Laws of some kind are necessary every where, particularly for your exterior relations; the fewer, and the more simple, the better; and the sooner you set about making an attempt, the sooner, of course, you can perfect a system. Wise laws are the highest achievements of the human mind.

In the letter, which I had the happiness to present to you on my first introduction, you have a distinct view of the feelings of my government towards you, and can easily comprehend the course of conduct on your part, which will be most acceptable to it; and also the most reasonable, as well as permanently useful to both parties.

The government of the United States entertains the sincerest desire to preserve you in all your sovereign and local rights, so far as they may be infringed or openly violated by acts of its citizens; and in return, will only expect strict justice towards them, and a fair reciprocity in all transactions.

The general objects of a cruising ship, or man-of-war, are the care and preservation of the lives and property of our citizens, where governments do not exist for that purpose, or where governments are unmindful of their obligations.

If any wants or disaffection are expressed by our trading interest here, (in such communications as the merchants may send by me,) they will meet the attention of my government; but I hope it will appear, that little cause of complaint exists. Had any been foreseen or known, probably my orders might have had especial reference to the cases.

As a further method to confirm the attachment of my countrymen, which is useful to you, and to elevate yourself in your own estimation, and place your government truly upon an independent basis, I must urge the perfect liquidation of your debts, at the period promised; and a care not to contract others. Unless free of debt, or with ability to discharge it, no nation takes its equal place among others.

Soon after I arrived, strangers pointed out to me two taverns—one as belonging to the king, and the other to Governor Boki. The impression made upon me, by this information, was unfavorable to you both. Such establishments are necessary in a port like Honolulu, but they ought to be conducted by private individuals. In the direct gains arising from them, you should not participate—nor ought you to frequent them. Very few should be allowed—and on such as are permitted, a high revenue or tax might be imposed; by which means its resources will be increased, and the burden, at present resting on the industrious, will be lightened. The opportunity which has been afforded me, of becoming personally acquainted with you, (by your having been my guest on board ship for some time,) has, I am happy to say, conduced greatly to enlist my affections for your personal credit and welfare; and your advancement in the acquisition of our language and letters persuades me to urge you to pursue English studies diligently. By a due division of your time between studies, business, and becoming pleasures, your life will be rendered delightful to yourself, and beneficial to those, who, by circumstances, are placed under your protection; and who must ultimately look up to you for example. You are yet young; now is the period to lay the foundation in your character for extensive usefulness. Ere long, the cares of government must devolve on you alone. Kaahumanu and your other friends are advanced in years, and must soon, in the course of nature, be taken from you.

The geographical situation of your inheritance is so peculiarly favorable, that no one can foresee the degree of importance it is to attain; every year its additional consequence will be apparent to you;

therefore, I again repeat, acquire the English language. It will open to you an unlimited field of knowledge; in the right use of which, you may found a name more imperishable and enduring than the islands of Hawaii. I will only add one other recommendation, which is, the semi-annual or annual meeting of the great chiefs, for the revision of your state affairs; alternately, for convenience sake, at Honolulu and Lahaina.

All that I have said, you will, I think, receive in the spirit of kindness, and as coming from your friend.

W. C. B. FINCH.

LETTER XXII.

JOINT LETTER OF THE MISSIONARIES TO CAPTAIN FINCH.
WITH HIS ANSWER.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Port of Honolulu, }
November 22d, 1829.

TO-MORROW, the 23d inst., was appointed immediately on our return from the Windward Islands, for the departure of the Vincennes for the Chinese Seas; and among other evidences of the approaching close of our visit here, is a correspondence which has just taken place between the missionaries and Captain Finch. Of this I am permitted to furnish you with a copy.

TO C. B. W. FINCH, ESQUIRE, COMMANDER OF U. S.
SHIP VINCENNES.

Hawaiian Islands, Nov. 14th, 1829.

Dear Sir :

It was with no ordinary interest that we looked for the arrival of the Vincennes at these, but recently, heathen shores ; and it is with no common feeling that we now approach the period of the final departure of so welcome a visitor.

The polite and friendly attentions which you have generously shown to the members of our mission, during your visit at these islands, not only furnish us with an ample apology for the freedom we take in addressing you a line before your departure, but also require of us some united testimony of our gratitude for your kindness, and of the satisfaction which we have derived, both from the communications you have borne from your government, and the happy course you have pursued in your intercourse with the rulers of the country.

We have long been accustomed to take a very deep interest in whatever appears directly or indirectly to affect the welfare of the islanders. We have marked with fixed attention the influence of public vessels of various characters visiting the islands, and of public agents residing among the people. We have seen and wept over the evils that have prevailed in this dark and uninviting region ; and while toiling, as it were, in the sweat and dust of a field of battle, for which we exchanged a pleasant home, we have witnessed a laudable effort on the part of the rulers to rise and free themselves, our hearts have been made to bleed afresh, to see them misled by interested counsel, injured and insulted by reproach and outrage, and wrongfully opposed and oppressed.

We have rejoiced, too, with them in every evidence of the improvement of their character and condition ; and in every indication of their future prosperity, and always hail with gladness the voice of friendship and of wholesome counsel, even from far countries. As such the communication from the secretary of the navy, which you have had the honor to bear and to communicate to the king and chiefs, is to us peculiarly cheering. The marks of friendship and wisdom, which that interesting document bears, and the importance of its principles, coming as it does from the highest authority of a great and friendly nation, which the people are accustomed to respect, cannot fail to secure for it a kind reception, a studied regard, and a grateful consideration from the young king and his more enlightened counsellors. It would not be strange should it mark one of the happiest eras in the history of this rising nation, however boldly it may be said by some, that the people are not yet prepared for such high toned advice ; and by others, that some other channel would have been preferable.

Are not the people, indeed, prepared for such expressions of friendship and good will as the president has been pleased to make to them ? Are they not prepared to have their just rights acknowledged by so high a power as America ? Are not the rulers here prepared to be encouraged to adopt salutary regulation for the promotion of order, justice, and peace, in their own undisputed territories? we admit, for a moment, that they are not yet prepared to act with decision and discretion on all the points recommended for their consideration, what better means could have been devised, than that communication from our government to raise them to the very condition to which that letter supposes them to have advanced? But we have good reason to believe that they are prepared for just such high toned advice; such professions of friendship; such acknowledgments of rights; such congratulations for the rising prosperity of the people; and such just reprehensions of every wanton abuse of their rights, or violation of law and justice by foreign residents, as that well advised letter contains. We therefore heartily rejoice that the young king and his counsellors have, from so high and respectable a source, received such encouragement to take the dignified stand they ought to take, and which they are able to take, among nations; such encouragement to go forward in promoting learning and virtue, giving protection and aid to every lawful and laudable pursuit, and of becoming in fact what rulers ought to be, "a terror to evil doers, and a praise to them that do well."

If, then, the rulers of the people follow (as we hope they will) the important suggestions from the government of the United States, and adhere to the spirit of that communication, who in all the world will have a face to complain?

That important document, so well devised, so opportunely delivered, so happily supported by the kind and courteous attentions of yourself and your officers, and the judicious counsel you have been pleased repeatedly to give the king and chiefs, both in writing and in various conversations, will, we feel assured, prove in a high degree salutary, and tend greatly to encourage them to pursue a more correct and dignified course in the management of their affairs; inspire them with a higher respect for themselves, (a grand principle of honorable conduct); shield them from wanton abuse; secure protection for lawful trade; increase the confidence of the people as to the value of civilization and Christianity, and proportionably their attachment to those who have taken up their residence among them, and are wearing out their lives, to teach them letters and "the religion of the Christian's bible," and to lead them to the enjoyments of civilized life and society, and all the blessings of salvation.

It will be among the most precious recollections in your review of life, should you find that the visit of the Vincennes to the Island of Hawaii, had materially contributed to these objects.

Whether any thing has been gained, in reference to the improvement of the people during the ten years since our mission was sent forth, you, sir, who have now visited four of our stations on the three principal islands of the group, are able to judge.

That you may have some means of forming a correct opinion, besides your own observations in a single visit, you will permit us to refer to a few facts with which you are acquainted, in reference to the subject.

In the year 1820, the people might justly have been denominated a nation of drunkards and gamblers—without letters, without morals, without religion, and without hope; their intercourse debased, their minds stupified, their evil habits deep rooted—forbidding almost utterly any attempt or hope of amendment.

Now no nation probably is more temperate or less addicted to gambling; their language has been reduced to writing; morals have been improved, and the Christian religion established on a firm basis; old and deep-rooted habits of evil have been, in thousands of instances, broken up; social intercourse improved; hope inspired; and, apparently, national enjoyment extensively promoted.

Industry has been encouraged; commerce has been increased about 500 per cent.; schools have been every where established; and about 30,000* of the inhabitants, perhaps more, brought under instruction; about 500† pages of different matter have been prepared for the press, in the language of the country, including more than half the New Testament, and 100 Hymns. The whole printed and published in various forms by our press, amounting to about 7,000,000‡ pages.

The slate, the pen, and the needle, have, in many instances, been substituted for the surf-board, the bottle, and the hula (native dance); domestic peace for family broils; order for confusion; and decent clothing of foreign manufacture, for loathsome filth and nakedness. But your own observations, after all, will be the most satisfactory to yourself and your friends; and we hope you may yet have another opportunity to renew them, under still more favorable circumstances.

Before we take our leave of you, sir, we must beg the favor, that on your return to our happy country, whose honor and prosperity are still dear to our hearts, you will make known to the government the high sense of obligation which we feel, for the very friendly and favorable notice which it has been please to take of us as American citizens, and of the objects for which we left the land of exalted privileges which gave us birth.

To the officers of the Vincennes, whom we have had the happiness to know, and from whom we have received many kind civilities and acceptable favors, you will allow us to tender, through you, our grateful acknowledgments.

To yourself, dear sir, we present our cordial salutations, with the assurance, that we shall long cherish with gratitude the recollection of your interesting visit, your studied and persevering kindness, and attention to us, in our humble and toilsome station.

Wishing you all prosperity and happiness in this world, and the blessings of that eternal life, for which we hope, in the world to come, we bid you farewell ; and subscribe ourselves,

With highest esteem,

Very affectionately,

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Honoulu, Nov. 22d, 1829.

Gentlemen,

Your agreeable letter, dated on the 14th inst., was placed in my hands yesterday. Its interesting character deserves, but pressing arrangements, preparatory to my departure in the morning, preclude, so full an answer as I could desire.

I rely upon my deportment towards you all, as the best evidence I can give, of my respect for your pursuits; and I feel safe in saying, also, that whatever kindness you may have received from the officers, is the effect of their own high sense of propriety and your merits. I will, at your request, make them acquainted with the tenor of your communication; and probably may submit it to their perusal; and I shall feel happy in being the organ of conveying the sense of obligation which you profess to owe my government.

For your individual happiness, gentlemen, and the comfort, security, and well doing of your families, accept my very earnest and friendly wishes.

I am, respectfully,

LETTER XXIII.

DEPARTURE FROM OAHU, AND LETTER OF THE KING TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

U. S. Ship Vincennes at sea, }
November 24th, 1829. }

At the request of the king, who wished to write a letter by Captain Finch to the President, the Vincennes remained at Honolulu, one day longer than the time originally fixed for sailing. This morning, however, immediately after breakfast, we left the harbor and remained outside the reef, till his majesty's communication should be sent off.

At twelve o'clock, the boat of the private secretary was reported alongside; and, as soon as he had delivered the dispatches, we filled away with a salute, before so fresh a breeze, that as the evening just now closed round us, the faintest outline of Oahu behind, and of Tauai, forty or fifty miles on our right, could scarcely be discerned in the haze of the distance.

Thus, my dear H——, I have a second time bidden a supposed final adieu to the Sandwich Islands: but now, through the kindness of God, under auspices far more happy than on the previous occasion. Then every imagination of the future, equally with every remembrance of the past, was shrouded in gloom; and fearful apprehensions of sorrows just at hand, whose depth can only be told by those who have experienced them, gave double poignancy to thoughts, and feelings of deep interest and affection lingering on things, and scenes, and friends behind. But now, while warm love for many a justly endeared object, and the liveliest interest in the glorious work of blessing and salvation there triumphantly achieving, filled my eyes with tears, and my heart with prayer, as the beautiful island receded rapidly from our gaze, no existing circumstances denied me a full participation in the bright looks and joyous anticipations of my companions, who felt, that after an absence of more than three years, their faces were now fully set, towards all most dear in country, family, and friends ; and as we crowded sail upon sail, till we exhibited a mountain of canvass, widely bellying to the wind, the language of every heart and every eye, from the quarter deck to the fore-castle, was

On opening the packet of the king, the following translation of the document addressed by him to the president was found. Both the original and translation are in his own handwriting.

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Island of Hawaii, November 23d, 1829.

Best affection to you, the chief magistrate of America. This is my sentiment for you ; I have joy and gratitude towards you on account of your kind regard for me. I now know the excellence of your communicating to me that which is right and true. I approve with admiration the justness and faultlessness of your word.

I now believe that your thoughts and ours are alike, both those countries and these countries, and all large countries. We are the children—the little islands far off in this tropical climate.

We have recently had an interview with Captain Finch, with joyfulness and with sentiments of kindness and pleasure towards him. I do now hope there will be a perfect agreement between you and us—as to the rights and duties of both of our governments, that the peace now subsisting between us may be perpetual, that the seat of our prosperity may be broad, and our union of heart in things that are right such, that the highways of the ocean may not diverge, because there is a oneness of sentiment in our hearts, with those distant countries, these islands, and all lands.

May our abiding by justice triumphantly prevail, that all who come hither may be correct in deportment, and all who go thither from this country.

This is my desire, that you and we may be of the same mind. Such, too, is my hope that we may pursue the same course, that we may flourish, and that true prosperity may rest perpetually on all the nations of the world, in which we dwell.

Look ye on us with charity; we have formerly been extremely dark-minded, and ignorant of the usages of enlightened countries. You are the source of intelligence and light. This is the origin of our minds being a little enlightened—the arrival here of the word of God. This is the foundation of a little mental improvement which we have recently made, that we come to know a little of what is right, and of the customs of civilized nations. On this account do we greatly rejoice at the present time.

I give you thanks, too, for your bestowing kindly on me the globes and the map of your country, to be a means of mental improvement for me, and also for your other presents to my friends, who rejoice with me in the reception of the favors which you have granted them.

Long life to you in this world, and lasting blessedness to you and us in the world to come.

RETROSPECTIVE VIEW OF THE VISIT AT THE SANDWICH ISLANDS, BY CAPTAIN FINCH.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, at sea, }

Early after the arrival of our ship at Oahu, it became evident, that the policy and course of conduct pursued by Captain Finch was any thing but agreeable, to a majority of the foreign residents. Even before its public delivery, the letter of the secretary of the navy, addressed by the authority of the president to the king, was denounced by those made acquainted with its contents, as "a most pernicious document." And it was soon intimated, that a remonstrance of the principal American citizens, in reference to it, would be returned to the government, through the secretary of state, by the Vincennes.

Such a document is on board. I have not seen it ; but common report made me acquainted with its character, before leaving Honolulu. It consists of a protest, against the channel through which the president thought proper to communicate with the king—the secretary of the navy, rather than the secretary of state ; of a denial of any right in the secretary to inform his majesty, that the religion of the “CHRISTIAN’S BIBLE” is the true religion ; or to recommend the missionaries as American citizens to his kindness and protection ; of a declaration, that any charge of ill-conduct, in any American citizen at the islands, is false ; in an avowal, that, even if such were not the case, the government of the United States have no cognizance of offences, committed by its citizens beyond the limits of its jurisdiction ; and in a remonstrance against the propriety of introducing my name in a governmental paper !

I am spared the necessity, however, my dear H—, not only of any comments of my own on this subject, but, also, of any summary remarks on the state of the mission and of the island, by a “Retrospective View” of our visit, written by Captain Finch, with a copy of which I am furnished. Any one acquainted with the intelligence and acuteness of observation which characterizes his mind, with the candor of his judgment, and the integrity of his principles, will at once accord an approval to the justness of his strictures and the correctness of his views ; and, with this article, I cheerfully close my account of the present condition of the Sandwich Islands.

A RETROSPECTIVE VIEW OF THE VISIT TO THE SANDWICH, OR HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

AFTER an absence of nearly three years from home, on service upon the western coasts of South America, I felt as if on the certain eve of returning thither, as did the ship's company, whose terms of engagement had expired.¹ The orders to proceed on an extended cruise were therefore unexpected and most unwelcome. In addition to disappointed hopes, I was little prepared, and far from being desirous of visiting islanders whose moral character was undergoing change, and whose primitive traits were fast disappearing; whether for the better was a problem which I supposed a cursory glance and short survey would not enable me to determine. Again, I felt a reluctance to be placed in circumstances which I foresaw might involve me, as a party, in the various conflicting accounts which had been given to my government and the public in regard to these people, and was afraid that irregularities amongst our trading or whaling vessels, and collision with the natives, might invite my interference, which, if exerted, yet probably would fall short of the exigencies of the demands. Added to these considerations, I had heard of the hostility which was entertained by almost all foreigners resident at those places, where teachers of the gospel, or missionaries, had established themselves. I promised myself, on the whole, neither gratification nor usefulness, and therefore undertook the voyage with real regret; but now that it is gotten through with, I feel relieved, and look back rather with surprise that I engaged in it with apathy, or that I anticipated difficulties and a distaste which I have not, to the extent apprehended, realized.

My visit has been performed without any occurrence other than of a pleasurable kind attending it: my interposition when called for has been mildly exercised, and availing—the objects of our government, I hope, answered—and the good effects, I fear not, will be understood by any commander who may, hereafter, perform the like routine of duty. My reports collectively to the government will exhibit what I have done, as well as furnish my opinion on many points, and show the unavoidable (and supposed) defectiveness of the orders and laws under which I had to act. These are lucidly pointed out by my predecessor, Captain Jones of the Peacock.

The very advanced stage of the people of the Sandwich Islands in the points involving civilization, religion, and learning, is so well established, so generally known and admitted, that I forbore to give statements of them equally minute with those I had made respecting Nukuhiva, Tahiti, and Raiatea. Their civilities, letters of correspondence, and transaction of business with me, place them in a just light, and will enable our government to appreciate and judge them properly without my saying a word in their favor, beyond the simple declaration that they are much in advance of the Society Islanders, cheeringly and agreeably enlightened, acquainted limitedly with their own interests, capable of extending them, and sensible of the value of character as a nation. Their indolence of habit and amiability of disposition mislead the judgment of persons who deny their pretensions to intelligence and capacity for self-management or government; the first being overcome, and their knowledge fully aroused to the advantages which their locality affords, the latter objection will manifest itself to be erroneous. To aid in every way to elevate and instruct them, and increase their self-pride and confidence, ought to be a source of pleasure, as well as the policy of those foreigners who are amongst them; but such I am satisfied is neither the design nor practice of those persons: they pursue, on the contrary, a short-sighted course, watchful of their own immediate gains or advantages, apparently regardless and thoughtless of those who are to succeed them, and whose security, comfort, and prosperity, may be increased or diminished by the judicious or unwise plans they at present or may hereafter adopt. The gentlemen now at the Sandwich Islands forget that the natives are not the same naked, uninstructed creatures which they were when they first went among them, and in this forgetfulness, intentional or not it is immaterial, treat them almost precisely as they did formerly, and contemn their pretensions to knowledge and improved condition.² Human nature cannot nor will the chiefs much longer bear or tolerate such arrogance and injustice.³ The more the respectability and importance of the chiefs and people are increased by voluntary and generous attentions from foreigners, the greater will be the security insured to themselves. Why will they continue to enjoy the hospitality of the natives, contract engagements to large amounts with them, with full reliance upon their integrity, and yet treat them in a contumelious manner or with indifference: such is nevertheless the inconsistency I observed.

I am at a loss to decide wherein the foreign residents have just cause to complain of or to contemn the government of the Sandwich Islands; they affect to believe that all its measures are dictated by the missionaries. I really do not think so: they doubtless in their station as teachers have influence; but I rather believe it is confined as closely as is practicable or possible to that relation and no other: unless it was perceived by them, that the government was about committing an act of indiscretion or gross blunder, I doubt if their voice would be heard. It is a most lamentable fact, that the dislike of the missionaries by the foreign residents, has a tendency, as yet, to paralyze the efforts which the natives are so laudably making to render themselves worthy of the support and confidence of enlightened Christian and distant nations; and this one circumstance will render, for some time to come, the visits by our ships disagreeable to the officers who have to make them. The constant complaining against the missionaries is irksome in the extreme, and in such contrast with the conduct of the missionaries themselves, that I could not but remark their circumspection and reserve with admiration: the latter never obtruded upon my attention the grounds or causes they might have to complain; nor did they advert to the opposition they experienced, unless expressly invited thereto by me.

(3) If personal profits in a sphere for general competition or operations are to be regarded as exclusive objects, then probably the original condition of the natives was more favorable formerly than now: I hope that I shall not be viewed as disposed to trammel laudable commercial enterprize.

If the understandings of the natives are imposed upon by the religious injunctions of the missionaries, the evil will ultimately correct itself, by the very tuition which they afford the inhabitants, more certainly and effectually than by the denunciation and declamation of foreigners, who are interested and temporary sojourners, without other than moneyed transactions to engage the confidence of the natives,⁴ whereas the missionaries have adventured their families among them, and stand pledged as to the issue of their undertaking before, not only the American public, but the world at large.

(4) The missionaries possibly are too rigidly literal in their interpretation and enforcement of the commandments; and an error may arise from this source in the formation of provisions for police or other regulations by the native government, and in their subsequent administration and fulfillment.

Opposition similar to that now existing against the present missionaries would, doubtless, extend to like persons of any other denomination. All of our countrymen do not think alike on the special subject of religion, and in which our government (very wisely and happily) does not interfere; but, all those who visit the islands in the pacific for trade, will feel (and rightly, too,) that such order grows out of the establishment of christianity in whatever form introduced, as to preclude undue advantages, ensure personal security, and place the islander on a footing of equality with his fellow man. Why it is supposed necessary to retain the Sandwich Islanders in a state of deeper vassalage and subjection to our avarice and caprices, than those of inferior cast to ourselves at home, I am at a loss to determine. If the islanders are weary of the instruction they receive, or the restraints imposed in receiving it, they have tongues to speak, and hands to use; and judging by the unrestrained life they have heretofore led, it is but fair to infer that they would speak and act, if causes existed for their doing so. Whilst they court knowledge, why should they be ridiculed in the search of it? Can it be shown that they have misapplied to the injury of others the limited acquirements which they do possess; on the contrary is it not certain that intercourse with some of them has been rendered more easy, and confidence increased by this very circumstance? Are they not truly their own masters on the principle of birth, soil, and action? Wherein the right of our merchants then to interfere with them, wherein that of the missionaries? but by the best of all rights, their own invitations;⁵ the missionaries and families are also probably more than twice as numerous as the mercantile class. If not satisfied let merchants withdraw themselves; refreshments, &c. can still be had without their agency, as heretofore by the masters of such vessels as may frequent the islands. I would ask if our countrymen arrogate any thing to themselves other than what the laws allow at Hayti? Do they ever openly reflect upon that government? Why will they act differently, require or expect more at the Hawaiian Islands?

So great was the friendship and correctness of deportment of the chief islanders, that I could scarcely suppose myself to be among a people once and so recently heathen. Variance of language and complexion alone reminded me of it. These views may very widely vary from the opinions of those who have preceded me only a year or two; I can well believe that we do not keep pace (by means of our intercourse) with their improvements. Intervals of three years make wonderful changes, and for the better; careful and recorded observations only will assure us of the reality of them. The present king, as he advances in years will, I feel pretty well persuaded, be a blessing to his people; his usefulness will, however, depend in a great measure, upon the choice which he may make in a companion of his power and the cares inseparable: a doubt and difficul-

(5) It has been remarked to me that Christianity was established, or rather idolatry subverted, before the arrival of missionaries—granted: has not the arrival of these persons confirmed these measures, and strengthened the natives in their previous convictions.

By the diffusion of knowledge among the islanders at large, I can readily suppose that the influence of the resident whites, and the abject and slavish adulation and distinction heretofore paid to them have been diminished in some degree:⁶ will not this circumstance, to a limited extent, serve to explain the sourness and bitterness which the whites cherish, and, on many occasions, display towards the chiefs as well as the missionaries? Suppose that undue power is exercised by either residents, merchants or missionaries, over the government of the Sandwich Islands; from which source will either the greatest good or least evil ensue? I certainly think from the missionaries.

It is seriously to be regretted that the missionary society, or some liberal minded and generous gentlemen of wealth, does not establish and maintain at the Sandwich Islands, on an adequate salary, a person of independence of character, and suitable attainments, separate from clerical avocations, merely as an adviser of the chiefs, on the principles of government, jurisprudence, &c. &c.,⁷ or, if our government would

(6) A like consequence will eventually ensue to the chiefs, though I think their positions and prerogatives will never be infringed.

(7) It would be beneficial also if the means of subsistence for missionaries were augmented; which when done will enable them both as to personal and in general respects to appear to more advantage (than they can at present) without any departure from proper sanctity of character. They ought, if possible, to be rendered entirely independent of the natives, or government, until both become more fully sensible of the value of the time, study and attention which, as teachers, they bestow in their incalculably important functions.

appoint salaried Consuls, or a Chargé d'Affaires to the islands, respectively restricting them from all participation in business, the desired object might be obtained ; but whilst such official personages are still merchants, their influence is comparatively small or nothing with the government ; but their own and their patron's interest necessarily engrossing subjects.

The various communications which I bear to my government will, I trust, awaken its more pointed attention to these Islands, and to the Americans who reside in them. The protest of the merchants and traders to the principles contained in the public letter which I delivered will claim notice ; it was prepared during my short absence to Hawaii, but in my letter of the 22d November, I had anticipated its point.⁸ I feel constrained to utter this opinion, that its arguments are unsound, its language unbecoming and hasty, its inferences unfounded, and its implications ungenerous, and in every respect injudicious. In the same breath, they, the signers, deny the jurisdiction of our government, and yet invoke protection :—taunt one department with ignorance ; defend the conduct of all classes of persons who have visited the islands ; fit a cap to their own head, which probably was not intended for them ; speak insultingly of, and denounce missionaries ; unnecessarily allude to the Rev. Mr. Stewart, and insinuate that the Vincennes has done nothing but aid

(8) Although the letter of protest is dated Nov. 10, I did not receive it until the 23d Nov. a subsequent to my communication to the secretary of the navy, advising him of my proceedings and intended further movements.

Is it not meant by establishing a consulate, that it shall receive the control over our citizens within its reach, which the government of the United States indisputably would exercise, if these citizens had remained at home. A public functionary openly declares and insists that his own government has no control over acts committed at the Sandwich Islands! Can our laws have been framed so blindly, or is this construction to be ascribed to the desires or sinister counsels of others? The signers' "powerful reasons" for fearing for their "lives and property" are not set forth, and therefore, I think, can only be creatures of their own minds, unaided by facts;⁹ the letter I conceive puts no more power into the hands of the natives than belongs to them, or than they always wielded; there can be no good reasons of objection to a letter coming from the head of any department, if the president chooses to give such direction to it. I cannot perceive that the letter advocates any particular sect in religion; nor are the petitioners required or called upon to recognize or follow the religion of the islanders now, more than they were, when idolatry existed. In the nature of things, it is impossible that the petitioners can assume a responsibility for the acts or conduct of all citizens who have visited the islands, or that they can undertake to establish the position that there never has been violations of the laws, or interference with the government of the islands.¹⁰ Surely the right on the part of our government to inquire into the conduct of its own citizens, sojourning temporally abroad, was never until now contested ; and as to the propriety of the governmental letter adverting to the appointment of Mr. Stewart, I humbly conceive that the government was quite as well qualified to judge, as the petitioners or protestors.

(9) If, as they say, the chiefs have been made fully to understand the letters, then it follows that security must result to every body.

Lest any thing which I have said may be construed as unduly favoring the missionaries, I take this occasion to remark that I am not of their particular church, but am a Protestant Episcopalian ; so that I am under no bias on that score.¹¹

I have in my reports expressed an interest for Nukuhiva, and given it a decided preference in point of locality over the Society Islands. I am confirmed in this predilection ; and more than ever convinced that it is a most eligible place for our commerce, and that it will become, and deserves to be, the rival of Oahu. The natural tact and vivacity of the Nukuhivans are more remarkable, and superior to that of the Sandwich Islanders. The situation of the former, unless communication is had eventually over the isthmus, is far better than that of these people, for the advantages of trade by way of Cape Horn ; and I earnestly hope, that the present inviting and propitious moment will be embraced to confer benefits on the

(10) Probably these matters come not within the scope of the gentlemen's notice, or were not thought of before.

(11) There can be no doubt that an American interest and influence is insensibly produced by benefits derived from the missionaries as American citizens.

Nukuhivans, and secure commercial advantages to ourselves.

The novel and informal way in which property in vessels is transferred at Oahu, from one individual to another individual, each of different nations, and the license and latitude under which they navigate, deserve to be looked to. Those which go to the coast of Mexico and Northwest Coast, complain of the treatment by the authorities—I cannot say how justly; but suspect there is, in this, as in almost all other cases, two sides to the same story. I rather think that some of the island commerce carried on by foreigners, if met with at sea by a regular cruiser, would prove a fair prize, by reason of a want of, or imperfect papers, &c. It is quite common to see vessels at the Sandwich Islands, without names on their sterns, with altered names, every medley of crew, and other circumstances unusual elsewhere.

The various complaints which were made to me at Oahu, induce me to suppose that great irregularities often prevail in the prosecution of this distant commerce; the severities which are sometimes practised towards crews is doubtless illegal—more harsh than in the navy, and in most instances inconsiderate; but on the other hand, the ill temper and recklessness of character which is often manifested by the sailors, unquestionably call for coercion and restraints of some nature; how these can be wisely delegated is the desirable point. The ambiguity and evasion used in shipping crews are the chief evils to be removed. This is the incipient stage of all the dissensions and difficulties which ultimately arise, and most generally exist during the whole space of a voyage. On these matters Captain Jones of the Peacock has already spoken most fully.

Of the value of property owned by American merchants at Oahu, or of that intrusted to their care and safe keeping, and in depot, I can form no certain opinion; but infer from appearances, and the activity with which transfers or sales are effected, that it does not at any given period exceed eighty or one hundred thousand dollars.

In these remarks or review, I have abstained from giving any traditional or historical notices of the islands, their natural appearances, productions, or population, &c., all of which can be derived from numerous published accounts.

Respectfully submitted.

INCIDENTS AT SEA.

U. S. ship Vincennes, at sea, }
Dec. 11th, 1829. }

THE first incident, dear H——, worthy of notice since we left the Sandwich Islands, is one of sadness and of death. The most youthful and most healthful of our quarter-masters expired in great agony this morning, after a few hours only of serious illness.

The sudden death of such men is always accompanied to me with a shock from which I cannot at once recover. Sinful, and confident of life, they entertain no fear or thought of death, till they find themselves in his terrific and paralyzing grasp!—every power withers at his touch; the body sinks into helplessness and decay, while the spirit—ah! the immortal spirit, ascends to God only to hear, if his Word be true, the awful sentence of justice and holiness proceeding from his throne, against every guilty and impenitent sinner—“Depart from me, ye accursed!” In view of such a destiny, well may we exclaim, “O, that men were wise, that they understood this, that they would consider their latter end!”

 No dreadful doubts, or dreamy terrors start
 The hope religion pillows on his heart.
 When, with a dying hand, he waves adieu
 To all who love so well, and weep so true,
 Calm—as an infant to the mother’s breast,
 Turns fondly longing for its wanted rest,
 He pants to be where kindred spirits stay,
 Turns to his God, and sighs his soul away!”

With the bier of a shipmate, who but yesterday moved among us in all the vigor of health and manhood, in our view, the day has been one, as may be supposed, of more than ordinary quiet and soberness. The weather too has been of a character to add to the general listlessness and depression: an almost entire calm—the sails flapping uselessly against the masts, and every thing glaring in the burning heat of a tropical sun.

Just after sunset, the boatswain’s call summoned us to the deck, to perform the last service of fellowship for poor ——. The hour was well suited to the melancholy duty; the shades of the night had begun to fall around us; the vessel scarcely moved upon the water; the sea was smooth as a lake; and not a sound was to be heard, except the echoing of the last footsteps gathering round the gang-board at the ship’s side, on which the corpse was poised, ready to be lanced below at the appointed signal.

After such introductory portions of the Burial Service, as I thought appropriate to the funeral rite of one, for whom I fear—melancholy as the apprehension is—that there will be no “resurrection of life," I gave one word of admonition and exhortation—a word to which, under the circumstances, no ear could be stopped; and to the power of which, it is to be hoped, that every heart, for the moment at least, was open;—and then came the slide and dull plunge of the body which committed it to the bosom of the Pacific—a grave more wide and more deep than even a sailor often finds. The scene was one which all appeared to feel, and one which, I pray, none of those witnessing it may entirely forget.

The circumstance led to a conversation the most interesting, as regards the character and strength of feeling excited by it, I have yet known on board the Vincennes—with Mr. Hoyt, a young gentleman who joined our ship, from the merchant service at Oahu, to secure a passage to the United States, and who has had assigned to him the duty of a sailing-master's mate. The correctness and dignity of his general deportment early secured my good opinion; and the little direct intercourse that, till now, had taken place between us, had confirmed every kind feeling in his favor. We met this morning, in a mood of mind induced by the sight of the corpse, which neither of us felt disposed to conceal from the other; and which led to one of those conversations of undisguised feeling, which win the heart more fully, than years of common-place civility.

He appears to be one of the few "sons of the ocean," whose character and principles in all points are such as to command the respect of those with whom they are associated; and to whom the most pure in morals and the most refined in sentiment need not fear to extend their companionship and affection. The principles, habits, generous feelings, and pious disposition of such men, more effectually secure the warmth of my heart than the highest attainments of mind, fascination of manners, and attraction of rank, where they are not to be found. I delight to show and prove myself the friend of such: and new interest is given to our homeward voyage by the discovery, that there is at least one on board, beyond my immediate mess-table, who is disposed to cultivate my friendship in connection with the spirit and immediate duties of my office.

As to the crew in general, I have never been brought in contact with any set of men apparently so hopeless in morals, and so beyond the influence of every good impression. A small portion of them only were shipped in the United States. The rest have been gathered principally from the South American coast—wanderers upon the earth, without a country or a home. I have long felt great discouragement, as to any decisive benefit to them from the discharge of the services of my station, still I shall be enabled, on this point, I trust, to act upon the principle, that,

And often make us lose the good, we else might win,
By fearing to attempt.”

LETTER II.

ARRIVAL IN THE CHINESE SEA.

U. S. Ship Viracennes, at sea, }
Dec. 30th, 1839. }

THE early part of our voyage from Oahu was most uninteresting, characterized chiefly by light and variable winds, an excess of heat, and slow progress; and, but for the blandness and serenity of nights, bright and the irresistibly soothing associations connected with their loveliness, both on land and at sea, we should all have become a prey to ennui and the mal du pays.

And a moon exceeding beautiful,”

On the evening of the 24th, however, we were relieved from the listlessness of the preceding month, by the sudden rising of a storm, which came raging upon us, just before night, with the fury of a tempest. In less than an hour, in place of a clear, blue sky, and a dead calm, a scud, “thick and palpable,” almost as the darkness of Egypt, was rushing over us before a driving wind. A streak of lurid and unnatural light along the western horizon was alone to be seen; while the sky was every where filled with wild and ragged clouds, moving swiftly in various directions, portending some fearful exhibition of their violence. The sea, too, suddenly rose high ; foaming, and roaring, and dashing on board our ship, as she plunged and rolled in its irregular and broken swells. Add to this the bustle of two hundred men, in preparation for the worst that might come ; the rushing of the wind through the masts and rigging ; the bawling of the brazen-mouthed trumpet ; the answers and calls from aloft, coming faintly and indistinctly on the ear, as those uttering them were swept widely and swiftly through the air, in the uneasiness of the vessel under the pressure of the blast ; the flapping and cracking of the sails in reefing ; the flying of hats and handkerchiefs overboard, and you will have a total of circumstances as appropriate to a Christmas-eve at sea, as the snow storm, keen temperature, and blustering north-west wind are to the same season in Otsego. But, ah ! for us there was no blazing hearth nor cheerful fire-side ; no closely curtained parlor nor happy family circle to join, after having gazed on the sublimity and wildness without, till dripping with the peltings of the storm—but a wet and gloomy ship ; a gun-room, with groaning timbers and bulk-heads, and lights flickering in the wind, till their highest service was to make darkness visible ; chairs, tables, boxes, and books, fetching away and driving across the deck at every roll, with an occasional crash and jingle in the steward's pantry, as if all his bottles and crockery had gone en masse ; and last, though not least, an uncomfortable berth, in which it was impossible to lie still enough to sleep, but to which it was necessary to cling till morning, while every wave, sweeping in its fury along the ship's side, muttered its threat so closely and so loudly in the ear, that if from weariness one should fall into a doze, he could scarce fail of being roused from it the next moment, by dreaming of being drowned.

Such was the night, and such the morning; and ever since we have had a continuance of weather in some degree similar.

On the evening of the 19th inst. we passed the most northern of the Ladrone Islands, between Pagon and Agrigan, at a distance of fifteen or twenty miles. Both lofty islands, the last so much so as frequently to be seen at a distance of sixty miles. It was near night when we descried them, and nothing but a dim outline was to be seen against the sky.

Yesterday morning we left another landmark, in the northern Bashee Islands, behind us. These are considered one of the barriers of the "Mer la Grande," as the French very properly style the Pacific, and one of the portals of the "Celestial Empire," a principal city of which we expect soon to visit. Five of the cluster were in sight at breakfast time; insulated rocks, uninhabited and uncovered, except on the highest points, by a little grass and moss; and as we passed them, and thus entered the Chinese Sea, many of the gentlemen on the quarter-deck bade kind adios in Spanish to the Pacific, on whose waters they had for three years been floating—to which I added an aroha ino, as the band gave us "Auld lang Syne."

CASUALTIES OFF THE COAST OF CHINA.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Chinese Sea, }
January 1, 1830. }

YESTERDAY, a disastrous accident befel one of our crew. The morning was fine, and impatient of reaching the island of Macoa, the port of our present destination, we were crowding all sail, when the approach of a sudden squall caused a hasty order for the lighter canvas to be taken in.

In accomplishing this, one of the maintopmast studding sails went over board, through the mismanagement of the man at the haliards. The ship was moving rapidly through the water; and the moment the canvas came in contact with the sea, the rigging attached to it was dragged swiftly from the deck, and with such violence, that one of the lines, becoming entangled about the leg of a marine who had inadvertently stepped into its coil, severed the limb instantly from his body, as he was hurled against the bulwarks, and would have been carried overboard, had he not been seized by some of his shipmates.

The crash, at the same time, of the studding sail boom, as the weight of the sail in the water carried it away upon the yard, and the agitated call down the hatchway for Dr. Malone, led those of us below to suppose for the moment, that some one had fallen from aloft in the loss of a spar, and had been dashed to death upon the deck—an impression confirmed, on hastening up, by seeing streams of blood immediately under the main yard. It was a relief, therefore, to learn the truth, melancholy as it is; for there is hope for the poor fellow in this case, while there could have been none in the other. It was necessary to amputate the limb still higher than the spot at which it had already been severed, and the surgeon feels much anxiety as to the result.

The weather continued to be more and more boisterous, till we were again well nigh in a tempest; and for a few moments before day-break this morning, I was apprehensive of a terrific consummation of our disasters. After an almost sleepless night, from the excessive rolling of the ship, I was awaked suddenly by an alarm on deck, accompanying the loud exclamation of the commanding officer to the man at the helm, "hard a port! hard a port!—quick, quick!" followed by several rapid orders, and immediately afterwards by a slight concussion of the ship against something, and again by a second, that brought every one in the ward-room upright in his berth. "She will strike, sir—she will strike!" were the next words heard from the midshipman of the fore-castle, and I was expecting a tremendous crash of the Vincennes on the shore, when a quartermaster made his appearance with a light, and as another and still heavier blow was felt against the bow of the ship, checked the alarm of the ward-room by informing us that instead of running on shore ourselves, two fishing junks, in the darkness of the night, and sleep of their owners, had run upon us; but fortunately without being sunk—the first not having appeared to sustain any injury, and the second only the loss of a small mast.

We hove to immediately, and hoisted lights till daybreak; but heard nothing from the boats, and presume they suffered little damage. I was early on deck. Though no land was in sight, the whole horizon was studded with these craft—the only habitations of tens of thousands along the Chinese coast. Two are always in company, lying to under the same quantity of sail, attached to each other by hawsers, and dragging nets between them. They are long, rude looking structures, having one mast of considerable size in the centre, and another very small far aft, with an elevated stern and pointed prow, over which, in place of the bowsprit in our fishing smacks, is a wooden anchor. On either side of the bow a large eye is painted, to keep a look out as it is said, but without always answering the purpose of proper vigilance, as was proved by the incident of the night,—and which might have eventuated in a horrible catastrophe to those trusting their safety to such a watch.

On coming up with some of them, we soon had ocular demonstration of being in a new quarter of the globe. They all contain numbers of people—apparently whole families, men, women, and children, a cadaverous set, shrewd and cunning in their expression, seemingly good-natured, and highly delighted to see our fine ship rushing by, so near to their tossing craft, that we might almost have leaped on board.

At eleven o'clock we made the "Pedra Branca," a large white rock, a principal landmark in approaching one of the channels along the coast, leading to the entrance of the river on which Canton stands. These channels are formed by numerous shoals and islands, edging the mainland. One of the largest called the Grand Lema, was in sight at twelve; and shortly after a whole group, nearer the continent; lofty points of which were also seen rising beyond them in the distance. A pilot and comprador, or purveyor, boarded us early in the afternoon; and before nightfall we were once more at anchor off a small island called Loo-chow. All the islands in sight are exceedingly barren—scarce any more than lofty rocks covered with sand and ashes.

Fleets of fishing-boats are at anchor in many places close along the shore, forming floating villages, without the appearance of any other habitations, except a single hamlet opposite us, on Loo-chow. To this the pilot and comprador belong. It wears but an indifferent aspect, scarce better than that of a poor fishing village at the Sandwich Islands. The first sounds heard from it were those of the Gong, proclaiming, as was supposed, the hour of evening sacrifice—for when the pilot was asked, what it meant, he replied, "Josh—Josh!"—a corruption of the Portuguese "Dios." The sounds did not differ from those of a large drum; and the associations, connected with their rapid and monotonous tones, were those of sadness at the delusion and sin of so great a portion of the human family, as belong to this idolatrous empire.

LETTER IV.

VISIT AT MACAO AND CANTON.

U. S. ship Vincennes, Chinese Sea, }
January 25th, 1830. }

Two days after the date of my last letter, we came to anchor in the roads of Macao; and after a few days in that place and a hasty visit to Canton, are once more at sea on our passage to Manilla.

Macao is a Portuguese city, situated on a peninsula of a large island of the same name. It is a walled town, well defended, and contains a large population, including Chinese residents and foreigners. The harbor is good for small vessels, but ships of the class of the Vincennes can only lie in the open roads, at a distance of two or three miles from the landing; rendering the communication with the shore inconvenient and at times unpleasant.

It is the summer residence of the merchants of Canton, and the only place where foreign ladies are permitted to land: of course gentlemen, who have their families with them, are under the necessity of living there. Aware that Dr. Morrison was an inhabitant of this place, I early renewed the acquaintance I had the pleasure of forming with him in London in 1826, and was most cordially received by Mrs. Morrison and himself into their family. The privilege and happiness of enjoying the hospitality of such a house, and the society of such friends, especially in a land of strangers, cannot be too highly appreciated, and can never be forgotten.

Captain Finch soon became domiciliated with Dr. Bradford of Philadelphia, in the establishment of Mr. Latimer, a merchant of Canton, from the same city; while all the officers of the ship received every polite and kind attention from other foreign residents, including Mr. Plowden, the chief of the honorable East India Company's Factory, and other gentlemen connected with the service.

The town is well built, cleanly, and handsome; and we spent our time very agreeably, the few days that could be given to the enjoyment of its society. A principal object of interest and curiosity within the place is a grotto, or rather niche in a rock, in which Cameens is said to have completed the Lusiad. It is on the summit of a hill, in the midst of a garden and grounds tastefully laid out and well kept, commanding delightful views of the city and of its inner and outer harbors, and might well be supposed a haunt of the muses. I visited it twice—once in company with Captain Finch and Lieutenant Magruder, and a second time with Mr. Hoyt.

The library and museum of the East India Company, an aviary of splendid birds belonging to Mr. Beal an English resident, and a small Chinese temple, were also visited by us with much gratification.

The distance from Macao to Canton is about seventy miles. After considerable difficulty and delay, arrangements were made for a party of officers to go up. It consisted of Captain Finch, Lieutenants Sullivan, Dornin, and Lardner; Mr. Buchanan, Dr. Malone; midshipmen Bissell, Hawkins, Maury, Melville, Rowan, Wurts, and myself; but of our trip, and the few days we were in the suburbs of that city, I made only hasty notes. To write them in full would require a volume; and for the present I must be content with saying, that we were received and entertained in the most hospitable manner by C. N. Talbot, Esquire, acting consul for the United States, and by the gentlemen of the various American and other foreign houses.

Our voyage up was by what is called the outside passage; but Captain Finch, Lieutenant Sullivan, Mr. Buchanan, and myself, returned by a rout which afforded us a more extensive observation of the country. We reached Macao again on the 18th inst.; took our anchor for the Philippine Islands on the 22d, and hope to arrive at Manilla, their capital, in less than forty-eight hours from the present time.

DESCRIPTION OF THE BAY AND CITY OF MANILLA.

U. S. ship Vincennes, Bay of Manilla, }
January 30th, 1830. }

ON the morning of the 26th inst., we descried the Island of Luçon, or Luçon, at a point fifty or sixty leagues north of the entrance of this bay; and for the two days following coasted its shore, under the alternate influence of a land and sea breeze, with the outline of a mountainous and finely variegated country in full view.

The bay of Manilla is very extensive, ninety leagues in circumference, and the city situated on its southern shore, some twenty or twenty-five miles from the sea. We dropt anchor in our present berth early yesterday morning; and are surrounded by varied and beautiful scenery. The circuit of the bay is too wide to allow of distinct views of most of its shores; but the outline of the lofty hills and mountains, sweeping round it, is traceable at most times against the sky—giving to it, as a whole, much the appearance of a noble lake.

The view of the city, however, its suburbs, and the adjoining country on either side, and far inland, is full and imposing. The city itself, inclosed by walls of dark stone, and surrounded by a broad moat, lies on the north side of the river Pasig, here flowing into the bay, while the suburbs, containing a tenfold population, lie across the same stream on the north. The aspect of the two sections presents a striking contrast. The dark, moss-covered walls on the one side—screening every thing from sight except the red tile of the roofs of the houses, and the towers and domes of the cathedral and churches—stretch a half or three quarters of a mile along a green bank and carriage-drive by the waters edge; while on the other, in place of heavy walls, bastions, and embattled towers, nothing is to be seen, as far as the eye can reach, but a mass of huts of bamboo and reeds, of the slightest construction and rudest aspect, embowered in groves of the greatest luxuriance and verdure. The location both of the city and suburbs is very low—a characteristic of the surrounding country; but some miles inland it becomes more elevated and broken, and terminates at last on every side in lofty and beautiful mountains.

G. W. Hubbell, Esquire, consular agent of our government, waited early upon Captain Finch and his officers, with a tender of the hospitality of his house; and it is arranged that the captain, purser, surgeon, and myself, shall take up our quarters with him during our visit.

My friend Lieutenant Magruder accompanied me on shore at two o'clock to dine at the consulate, and to take a first glance of the city. The landing is by the river, a narrow and rapid stream, with a light-house, small, and of imperfect service, at its mouth on the suburb side. A long mole of granite, with a circular battery at the end, lines the river on the same side with the city ; immediately on passing which we perceived a greater stir of business than is seen from the bay, the river being lined on the side adjoining the suburbs, with numbers of vessels of various burdens, and covered with boats, plying rapidly in different directions. The walls of the city rise from the water, and extend more than half a mile up the stream to a fine stone bridge, affording the only communication by carriages with the suburb. Besides Mr. Hubbell, we found at the consulate Mr. King, a young gentleman of intelligence and piety, attached to the establishment, and captains Chever and Benjamin, the commanders of two American merchantment, at present in port.

The support of an equipage here is attended comparatively with so little expense, that it is not customary to walk, either on business or for pleasure ; and after dinner, at five o'clock, four carriages were in readiness for the whole party, with the addition of Mr. Stribling, from the ship, to take an evening airing. The usual vehicle is a light, low phaeton, handsomely finished, drawn by two small, but fleet horses, under the management of a postillion mounted on one of them. The rides in the vicinity of the city are varied, and of a degree of beauty almost unrivalled ; but that most resorted to in the evening is a broad road lined with a double row of trees, commencing at the bridge and following the course of the moat and glacis surrounding the city wall to the beach, and extending along it in front of the city, with an open view of the bay and shipping. Here all the rank and fashion of the place assemble for an hour or more every evening, presenting an animated and truly beautiful spectacle, as equipage after equipage rolls along in a double line—one passing in one direction and the other in another—affording a full view, from the open carriages, of all the dress and beauty of the first circles of society. The ladies wear neither hats nor mantles; but, according to the Spanish custom on such occasions, appear in full evening costume.

This drive is called the Calzada. It is open entirely to the country on one side, and leads past the public parade ground, near the bay. The standing forces of the government consist of 12,000 troops, all natives of the islands, commanded by Spanish officers. Five thousand of these are quartered in the city, and the remainder in various parts of the group. There is a regular evening drill; and about two thousand were now under arms. They made a fine appearance—are well dressed, well paid, and it is said, are loyal and firm in their attachment to the Spanish authority. Two full bands were performing, and I have no where heard finer martial music—though all the musicians, like the soldiers, are native indians of the country.

The airing and the drill usually terminate together;—the carriages, when the troops begin to move, changing the rapid rate at which, for the hour previous, they are whirled from one end of the Calzada to the other, to a walk, accompany them in long and slow procession, for the enjoyment of the music to which they march, till dispersed at the barracks near the bridge.

Two evenings in each week the military bands perform for an hour, in the palace square within the city, in front of the residence of His Catholic Majesty's representative, the Captain General and Governor of the Philippine Islands, at present the Senor Rocafuerté. This was one of the evenings; and we drove into the city to share in the entertainment. It is a well built, neat, and quiet town, containing a population of twenty thousand, principally Spanish, or of Spanish extraction; officers of government, and of the military department; priests, soldiers, &c. The streets are regular, and well kept, and the whole style of building that which I have described as prevailing in Lima—the Moorish quadrangle of two stories, with covered balconies from the second story over the street, and corridors within. Here the balconies, instead of lattice work of dark wood, consist of large sashes, to be thrown open at pleasure, set, in place of glass, with the inner shell of a large muscle, which, prepared for the purpose, is translucent, transmitting the glare of a tropical sun, in a mellowness of light equal to that passing through ground glass.

The houses of the foreign residents, and of the more wealthy inhabitants of the suburbs, are in the same style of architecture; the first story being appropriated to storehouses, kitchens, offices, stables, &c., while the second is occupied by spacious and lofty saloons, and sleeping and dressing apartments.

EVENING SCENES AT A CATHOLIC FESTIVAL, AND CALL UPON A NATIVE FAMILY.

Manilla, January 31st, 1829.

AFTER tea this evening a large party took carriages for a short drive to a parish in the eastern part of the suburbs, where, we were informed, a festival in honor of the patron saint was in celebration.

The native islanders at Manilla, as well as the Spanish inhabitants, are Roman Catholics by profession; and holidays of this kind, with processions, illuminations, and fireworks, in honor of them, are a chief source of amusement to the people. All the streets within the boundaries of the parish we now visited, were more or less illuminated, and those in the vicinity of the church, and through which the procession passed, as brilliantly lighted as a walk in Vauxhall; while all the houses were ornamented with gay hanging, wreaths of flowers, and evergreen, and various tawdry decorations of colored paper and tinsel.

The buildings here are all in the native style—cottages of greater or less dimensions, erected upon piles at various heights from the ground, and constructed of bamboo and reeds. They are usually square, with high roofs, running to a point in the centre; and are furnished so abundantly with large windows of lattice work, that when thrown open, the interior is as much exposed to view, as that of an ordinary summer-house in the grounds of a gentleman in our own country. This was the case on the present occasion; and, as we rode along the streets, we had as full a sight of the apartments, and of the families in gala dress, and in all the hilarity of festival times, as if we had been their guests.

Lofty arches of light wood, covered with colored paper and gilding, and blazing with lamps, were thrown across the streets; while, in other places, obelisks of the same materials reared their illuminated summits high in the darkness of the night; both having a tasteful and pretty effect.

The principal procession had closed before we arrived, but fireworks were setting off; and the image of the patron saint, a female martyr, as appeared from the exhibition, was borne past us. In the immediate vicinity of the church, the streets were so thronged with pedestrians of all ranks, from those apparently of gentility and affluence, to the lowest orders, that we were obliged to alight near a half mile from it, and walk the remaining distance. In the crowd there was quite as great a number of females, as of the other sex, and some evidently of the highest classes, in as full evening dress as if in an opera house or ball room.

An American gentleman of our party was acquainted with a native of some wealth, whose house we happened to pass ; and, at his invitation our whole company ascended a stair on the outside of the building, and joined a large circle of the relatives and family friends, convened for purposes of festivity—embracing, from appearances, the entire connection of our host, from grandmothers in the decrepitude of old age to infants in the arms. The building was purely in the native style, and exceedingly neat in its finish and furniture.

The master of the house, a middle aged man, was in the prevailing costume of the civilized indians: pantaloons of striped calico of gay colors, with a shirt of thin grass cloth, or of a material the peculiar manufacture of the country—said to be from the fibrous parts of the leaves of the pine-apple—as transparent as gauze, exhibiting the entire contour and muscular action of the arms, shoulders, and chest. This article is always beautifully finished, and often richly embroidered around the collar, bosom, and wristbands. Its most striking peculiarity, however, is in the manner in which it is put on—the lower parts being invariably over, instead of under, the pantaloons. Shoes and stockings are not usually worn, and a round beaver hat is the only other article, in the attire of a native gentleman.

The dress of the females consists of several garments. The first is a short gown of thin muslin, as transparent as the shirts of the men, reaching scarce below the bosom, and hanging unconfined around the form, in a manner often to expose the person between it and a petticoat, covering the lower part of the figure. Over the petticoat, which is usually of dark print, several yards of a striped or plaid calico of bright and strong hues is worn, by wrapping it several times round the form. The ankles and feet remain bare, while the great toe, with one or two of its nearest neighbors, is thrust into the point of a long slipper of morocco, velvet, or silk, often richly ornamented, which is slid along the floor or pavement in walking, with a sound that is any thing in my ear but the "dulce susurrum" of the Mantuan bard. The head is usually bare; but in full dress a fanciful turban of lace or wrought muslin is frequently worn, and also a richly embroidered half-handkerchief, of the same style, over the short gown.

They are fond of jewelry; and besides pendants in their ears, bracelets, and necklaces, I have seen the fingers of both the hands of a village belle stiff with diamond rings.

But to return to our host. We were received by him with great hospitality in an outer room, where tables were spread with a profusion of cakes and fruit, coffee, tea, &c., and then conducted into another in the midst of some twenty-five or thirty persons, principally females. The elder ones were in the costume of the country, with their hair turned smoothly back from the forehead, and hanging in a long queue behind—smoking cigars or chewing the beetle leaf and arica nut, with the juice of which their mouths and teeth were deeply stained. Those younger, however, their daughters and grand-daughters, were in European dresses of silk and muslin, with velvet spencers, gold chains, silk stockings and shoes. No particular introduction took place; and all entered readily into conversation with those of our company who spoke Spanish. Refreshments of various kinds were offered; and among other things served, were cigars and the arica nut and beetle leaf.

With a manifest desire to please, the master of the house sent for music, to entertain us with a dance of the country; but the gentlemen who intended returning to the ship plead, in excuse for not remaining, the detention it would occasion to the boat, and we took our leave.

The whole evening was a novelty; and a striking proof of the devices by which men, while gratifying the desires and affections of a worldly mind, persuade themselves that they are doing God service, and working out their own salvation. We are ever ready to tithe "in mint, in anice, and in cummin"—ready to sacrifice our money and our time, but prone to neglect the weightier matters of the law, and to withhold the services and devotion of the heart.

LETTER III.

A VILLAGE FETE, AND VISIT TO THE LAKE OF PASIG.

Manilla, February 3d, 1830.

BEFORE sunrise this morning, we were taking a cup of chocolate previous to setting off for the lake, some twenty miles distant, from which the river Pasig flows to the bay. Lieutenants Stribling and Magruder, with Dr. Wessels, and Midshipmen Irving, Hunt, Kieth, and Taylor, had slept on shore, in order to be ready for the trip in the cool of the morning; and, with Mr. Buchanan, Captains Benjamin and Chever, Mr. King and myself, constituted our party.

The excursion is made by water, on the Pasig; but it was arranged that we should not take the river at the town, but go in carriages to the village of Santa Anna, two or three miles distant, by which a long bend in the stream, with a strong current against us, would be cut off. Accordingly we were soon rolling along the calzada, in seven velochès, with the fleetness of the wind, which our ponies, fresh from their stalls, seemed desirous of outstripping. Our luggage was of rather a singular and luxurious character, as seen piled conspicuously at the feet of each couple, in the bottom of the chariots—consisting principally of pillows, which are here showy articles, the cases being of fine cambric, highly wrought and trimmed with inserting of lace and ribbons, over gay colors of pink, blue, yellow, &c.; and of fine mats of the country. Mr. King, with whom I rode, as caterer, carried also a box of claret, sandwiches, bread, cheese, and ale. The use of the pillows will be mentioned in due time.

The drive to Santa Anna is one of the most pleasant in the environs. The road branches from the Calzada, near a picturesque, cottage-like, thatched guard-house, at the north corner of the parade, and is formed by a straight avenue, lined richly with trees of great variety, among which the huts of the natives stand so thickly as to constitute an almost uninterrupted village the greater part of the distance. The freshness of the morning air made it peculiarly delightful; and the fifteen or twenty minutes occupied in accomplishing it, gave a stimulus both to body and mind, that filled every face with bright looks, and every bosom with cheerfulness, as we alighted, and all met, for the first time, in the rural and beautifully embowered Santa Anna.

It has been a general festival day, and all here was life and animation; the whole population, in varied and gay holiday dress, were just dispersing, after attending mass at a venerable and fine stone church—the first, I am told, established on the island—from whose octagonal and lofty turrets, several chimes of bells of different powers, ranged tier above tier, were pouring forth peals indicative of merriment and joy.

of the stream ; and it was but a few moments before we were afloat on the waters of the Pasig. We still remained as in the carriages, two and two in separate canoes, they generally not being capable of containing more, with room to indulge in the luxurious attitude of travelers in them which is that of reclining at full length, on a mat spread in the bottom of the boat, with the head elevated on one of the gay pillows I have mentioned, at a sufficient height to afford a clear view above the sides of the canoe of the banks of the river, and scenery on either side.

In order, however, to give you a better idea of this mode of traveling, I must describe the canoes with greater particularity. They are formed from a single trunk, having much the appearance of the barks of the North American indians ; but with several appendages, of which the most important to their safety are two outriggers, one on each side. These are of large bamboo, and lashed parallel to the sides of the banka, at the distance of two or three inches only ; and render them much more buoyant than they otherwise would be, and very difficult to be overturned. Another fixture of prime importance in such a climate, is a slightly arched awning of mats, supported by stancheons along the sides, which are notched so that it may be elevated or let down at pleasure ; proving a sufficient protection from the sun, rain, dew, and every inconvenience of the kind, as it may be lowered till resting like a lid on the canoe. The last convenience particularly worthy of notice, is a floor of split bamboo lashed closely together—making a cool platform to sit or lie upon, and is at the same time a protection from the water, which occasionally makes its way into the bottom. Two natives, one in the prow and the other in the stern, furnished with paddles, oars, and setting poles—with which they varied and relieved the labor of working the boat—managed it with great skill: and by taking advantage of the eddies and counter currents, first along one shore and then the other, propelled us up the stream of a rapid river, with much greater speed than would be supposed, without ocular demonstration.

The Pasig is a beautiful river, perhaps one hundred yards wide at Santa Anna, and diminishes very little for five or six miles. At that distance, the two streams forming it, one coming from the mountains in the east, and the other from the lake, unite: above this confluence, each is about half that width.

The general course of the river is sufficiently circuitous, to be the more pleasing for its windings, without making the progress tedious. The banks are about four or six feet above the surface of the water, almost every where perpendicular, and as richly fringed with foliage as the most luxuriant imagination could picture—the light, lofty, and graceful bamboo predominating, and contrasting strikingly and beautifully with the compact, wide spreading, round-topped mango. For the first three or four miles, the habitations of the people along this edging of trees and thickets, presented the appearance of a continued village, each hut having its own little groves and shrubbery, through and beyond which glimpses might occasionally be caught of extensive rice grounds, like the fields of a farm at home, with here and there a cluster of stacks of straw from which the paddy had been thrashed. In front of each cottage, a well built, substantial flight of stone steps leads down to the water, the last step forming a large platform under the surface, on which to sit or stand in bathing, which is here a daily habit. On some of these, mothers were washing their children previous to putting on their festival clothes ; and on others, busy housewives were preparing poultry and vegetables for the holiday dinner, or scouring their cooking utensils and eating dishes.

Rustic belles and beaux, in full dress, were at the same time seen strolling slowly among the groves, or hastening along as if destined to some distant scene of hilarity—all gay and animated, and evidently a mild and happy people. Occasionally a banka, filled with a sprightly party past us swiftly under the double impetus of the paddle and the current ; while to fill up the romance, from one or two, the tones of the song and guitar came floating to us in all their wildness, as they glided by.

So much were we delighted with the richness and beauty of the scenery, and the novelty of every thing around, that we could scarce believe ourselves at the village of Pasig, ten miles from Santa Anna, when, just after eight o'clock, the tower of its church was seen rising above the groves in which the town is embowered. We were to spend a principal part of the day here, with an intelligent and wealthy native, one of the aristocracy of the place ; and were most hospitably received by himself and a son who has

A short walk from the place of landing, brought us into a street leading directly to the church, in the centre of the village. The bells were ringing cheerily, and a procession passing around the inclosure in which the building stands—while crowds of people from all directions were pressing to secure a view. The principal image borne along, was that of a female saint as large as life, in a dress of blue satin, glittering with silver spangles, lace and tinsel, with a small hat of blue, loaded with white plumes: probably the patroness of the church and village—before which gaudy idol all prostrated themselves as it passed. The procession was composed—with the exception of a Spanish padre, and an assistant curé an indian—of females, from five and six years of age, covered with spangles, lace, flowers and jewelry, to girls of sixteen and eighteen, all in their best attire; bearing wax tapers in the full glare of a tropical sun, and chanting a hymn—probably of idolatry to the dumb and helpless object forming the most conspicuous part of the show.

They merely marched round the yard, and re-entered the church for the performance of mass—a service which none of us wished to attend; and after looking for a moment at the interior, which was not worthy of particular notice, we proceeded to the residence of our host.

The street leading to it, presented a pleasing sample of the neatness and rural beauty of a Philippine village, or rather town, for Pasig is said to contain 15,000 inhabitants. It is wide, and covered with a beautiful turf—wheels and animals of burden being so little used as to make nothing like a traveled carriage way through it—while the picturesque habitations of the villagers, overhung with trees, line it on either side, in separate inclosures filled with the mango, bamboo, arica nut, &c. &c.

Four or five hours passed rapidly away in various observations of the scenes around us ; and, after enjoying an extensive and beautiful view from the tower of the church, of the whole surrounding country, including the lake, three or four miles distant, lying like an inland sea in the bosom of its shores and mountains ; taking a stroll in the garden of the padre of the town ; visiting two or three native families—one of which was entertaining, with a feast accompanied by music and dancing, all the females forming the procession of the morning—and sharing in a profuse dinner of fish, fowl, meats, various dessert, and fruit, provided by our citizen friend, we prepared to extend our excursion to the lake.

For this purpose our bankas were again ordered. The scenery on the way did not differ materially from that which we had passed ; the banks being low and level, and richly clothed, till we approached the lake, where the paddy grounds extended to the water's edge. Two large passage and freight boats were at anchor near the entrance, waiting for passengers and cargo, for the head of the lake, forty miles distant. We boarded one of them for a few moments, but found nothing in the view they commanded to detain us—that of the tower of the church having given a better and more impressive idea of the extent and beauty of this sheet of water.

On our return we stopt to take leave of our hospitable acquaintance at Pasig; and found the additional refreshment of a cup of rich chocolate prepared for us. It was near four o'clock when we left. Our descent was rapid. Instead of landing at Santa Anna, we kept our boats; and were greatly gratified with the richness and beauty of the river scenery between it and the city, blended with the architectural display in numerous country seats belonging to the principal Spanish residents.

LETTER IV.

THE CAMPO SANTO, OR PANTHEON, THE PUBLIC BURIAL PLACE.

Manilla, February 8th, 1830.

AFTER a visit in the morning, with Mr. Hubbell, to the new custom-house, a noble and extensive structure of Grecian architecture in light free stone, immediately on the river, I devoted the day to further observations on the city and its environs, in company with my friend Mr. Hoyt.

Our first drive was a circuit of five or six miles to the north, a direction in which I had not previously been. The scenery is much the same as in other quarters, with the addition of a higher degree of cultivation, especially of the horticultural kind ; most of the vegetables with which the market is supplied being grown in that vicinity. We also visited the parish of Santa Magdalena in the east ; and from a rising ground three miles from the bay, enjoyed an extensive and beautiful prospect of the surrounding country, including the silver windings of the Pasig through the rich lowlands between Santa Anna and Manilla, and the towers and domes of the city and its suburb beyond.

After a handsome dinner with a party of midshipmen, at the only hotel in the place, we again joined our carriage ; and in company with Dr. Wessels and midshipmen Melville and Anthony, took a circuit along the bay in the direction of Cavité, a kind of outer port to Manilla, at a distance from it of some twelve or fourteen miles, through villages and embowered lanes of unrivalled beauty. On our return we stopped at the pantheon, or burial place, of the city, on the road towards Santa Anna. Its location is beautiful, with a gateway a little retired from the road on the eastern side. The exterior presents nothing but a heavy wall of brown stone, eight or ten feet in height, forming a circle a hundred yards or more in diameter, with a small low chapel, surmounted by a dome at the farther side opposite the gate.

Within, the scene is striking, and with its associations pleasingly affecting ; consisting of a tasteful and neatly kept shrubbery and flower garden, filled with bloom and beauty, and screening, in a degree, the niches in the wall for the deposit of the dead, for a longer or shorter period before being committed to a common receptacle. The chapel is the most simple and chaste Catholic structure of the kind I have ever seen ; so much so, that I was charmed with the good taste exhibited in it. Every thing within, except a tessellated pavement of white and blue, is of the purest white, with delicate mouldings and ornaments in gilding. The altar is finished and furnished with a crucifix, &c., in the same style, and, on either side, is a sarcophagus eight or ten feet in length and seven high, in keeping with the whole ; the one, surmounted by a mitre and crozier, designating its appropriation to the bodies of the archbishops of the metropolis ; and the other telling, by a sword and chapeau, that it is designed for a like service, to such of the governors general as may die invested with the chief civil and military office of the colony.

After having thus examined and admired the chapel, and having each received a bouquet of flowers from some servants in attendance, we were about turning from the door to continue our ride, with feelings and impressions of an agreeable, though not inappropriate character, when three or four dirty looking and shabbily dressed natives came up to the steps in a careless and light manner ; one of them bearing on his arms a large shallow tray, on which was lying what we supposed a gayly dressed waxen image ; but which, to our surprise, as he placed it on the pavement, and began to arrange wax tapers on either side, was perceived to be the corpse of an infant, perhaps a year old, upon whose emaciated features, and lifeless, though open eyes, there still lingered an expression of the pain, the sorrow, and the melancholy of death! The silk drapery, gold lace, gay flowers, and tinsel ornaments with which it was loaded, seemed sadly inconsistent and ill placed, beside the evidence presented by it of the frailty of life, and of the agonies of dissolution.

On making an inquiry, as to the time and manner of the interment, a gateway at one side of the chapel was pointed out, and we invited to view the burial place of infants. It is a small building of a circular form, over the portal of which was the inscription, "angelio," reviving again, in a remembrance of the declaration of "such is the kingdom of heaven," the associations of a pleasing kind which we had felt before the sight of the corpse—but only to have them dissipated a second time by that which was much more horrible and disgusting; for, on following our conductor along a kind of terrace round this mausoleum, the word "Osario," in large letters on the wall, immediately behind it, met our eyes; and, on looking into an area below, to which there was a descent on either side by a flight of stone steps, we beheld a most shocking mass of mouldering bones and flesh; of ghastly skulls, with mildewed locks and grisley hair still attached to them; while hands and feet, kept in form by the adhesion of dried and discolored tendons, were scattered among the bones of various other parts of the body.

It is thus, after having lain in the niches the appointed time, the bodies are withdrawn from their repose, cast out from their coffins, and left, an indiscriminate mass of corruption, to enrich, by the decay of time, the bosom of their mother earth ! This sight destroyed all the interest of our first impressions ; and we hurried from it, past the little corpse still lying unregarded in the midst of the avenue, to our carriages.

It is but a mile from the Campo Santo, or Pantheon, to the Calzada, which we reached in a few minutes ; and were at once in the midst of a scene in the widest contrast to that we had left. All the rank and fashion of the city were rolling along in various equipages, in all the gayety of evening dress, in a tropical climate ; while two thousand troops were performing the evolutions of the usual drill, to the rich and soul-stirring strains of full military bands, stationed at different points of the parade. We took our place in the line of carriages, coursing with them the beautiful drive, till the military display was over, and then returned to the city in the customary slow procession of the troops and bands.

THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE,

AND

LETTER I.

DESCRIPTION OF CAPE TOWN.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Table Bay, }
April 8th, 1830.

AFTER a voyage of fifty-six days from Manilla, including two at anchor in the Straits of Sunda, we yesterday doubled the Cape of Good Hope, and before night ran thirty miles north of it to the bay, in which we now are, without however securing an entrance to it before nightfall.

I was roused this morning at four o'clock by the dropping our anchors abreast of Cape Town, and went early afterwards on deck. We were within less than a mile of the town, lying closely along the water's edge, directly beneath the Table Mountain, which rises seemingly from its very outskirts like a perpendicular wall of granite, three thousand five hundred feet high. It is perfectly level on the top for a stretch of some miles, and in its face towards the water presents much the aspect, with the exception of the tuft-ing of wood and shrubbery, of the palisade cliff on the Hudson, near New York. It is flanked on one side by a lofty peak—from which it is separated by a barren and narrow valley—and an adjoining round hill called respectively the Lion's Head and Back; and on the other, by a naked cone of equal height, called the Devil's Peak; all so close to the town as to exclude every other view in that direction.

The town, containing twenty thousand inhabitants, is compactly and regularly built on wide streets, crossing each other at right angles; presenting a neat and agreeable appearance from the water, the prevailing color of the buildings being white or light stone. Many of the houses are low and flat-roofed, especially those skirting the borders of the town. These are the most conspicuous; and, surrounded by gardens and shrubbery, have a rural and tasteful aspect. Every thing adjoining, however, is sunburnt and dreary; though in the winter, or rainy season, the whole country is said to be beautifully verdant, and gaily enamelled with flowers.

We early exchanged salutes with a fortress on shore. The effect of our guns against the cliffs of Table Mountain was grand beyond any thing of the kind I ever heard—echo after echo of the deepest toned thunder—intermingled with reverberations, like the discharge of a rapid feu de joie—rolled round and round the bay between every gun, as if a whole fleet were in action.

At twelve, I accompanied Captain Finch, Lieut. Stribling, Mr. Buchanan, and Dr. Malone, in a call, under the guidance of James Bance, Esquire, Port

Captain, on His Excellency, Lieutenant General the Honorable Sir Galbraith Lowry Cole, G. C. B., Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Colony. The government house is at present undergoing repairs, and we were received at the colonial office. The general is an able and popular ruler, of commanding figure, and plain and unaffected manners; and, after giving us a cordial welcome to Cape Town; expressing the gratification it afforded him to see the American flag in Table Bay; regretting that the government house was in a state to deny him the happiness of entertaining us as he could desire, &c., &c., entered into general conversation for half an hour, with much intelligence and courtesy. On passing from the governor's rooms, we paid our respects for a moment to Lieutenant Colonel Bell, colonial secretary, a brother-in-law of the governor, the ladies of both being daughters of the distinguished diplomatist, the late Earl of Malmesbury, and were afterwards introduced by Captain Bance to the family of Mr. Ebden, a principal merchant of the place.

In the afternoon I accompanied my friend Lieut. Magruder on shore, and, joined by Mr. Buchanan, took a more full survey of the place. It is well built and beautiful—more like some of our American towns, especially those originally settled by the Dutch, than any I have seen in a foreign country. The general style of architecture is much the same; the apparent equality of wealth and rank similar; and the mixture of the population of British and Dutch extraction in a like proportion; while the household servants, coachmen, teamsters, &c., of blacks and mulattos, keep up the resemblance in these respects to many of the most flourishing towns in Pennsylvania, and the older sections of the state of New York. There is a blending too of city and village in the appearance of the streets, and evident habits of the citizens that is very agreeable; not unlike that seen in the principal towns in the interior of the United States. In one respect, however, it is totally unlike any place in our own country—in the numerous soldiery seen on post and in the streets; several regiments being usually quartered here.

The gardens formerly belonging to the Dutch East India Company are a principal ornament of the place. They occupy one hundred and twenty acres immediately adjoining the most compact part of the town—a principal part of which is inclosed and cultivated with fruit and vegetables, &c., leaving a wide and beautiful avenue of oak in the centre, nearly a mile in length, alone open to the public as a promenade. The government house is situated in the gardens on one side of the avenue—a rural and pleasant establishment, principally in cottage style, without any particular beauty, or elegance of architecture.

Before returning on board, I called on Mrs. Philip, lady of the Rev. Dr. Philip, superintendent of the missions in South America, under the London Missionary Society. I had previously learned with regret that Dr. Philip himself was several hundred miles in the interior, and that I should be denied the happiness of meeting him. The hospitality of her house was most kindly extended to me, but I have thought it advisable to remain on board ship during the short time we shall remain at our present anchorage.

LETTER II.

A RIDE TO CONSTANTIA, AND AN EVENING AT PROTEA, THE COTTAGE OF SIR LOWRY COLE.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Table Bay, }
April 18th, 1830.

THE visit of the Vincennes has been received so kindly at the Cape, and all her officers so hospitably entertained by the inhabitants, both Dutch and English, that my time since our arrival has been fully occupied. A daily reciprocation of civility has taken place between the ship and town, to the seeming gratification of all parties, and we shall have much reason to remember with pleasure the many circles of agreeable acquaintance formed at the Cape of Good Hope.

A principal object of curiosity in the vicinity is the estate of Constantia, so long celebrated for the peculiarity and excellence of the wine produced from its vineyards, and the Rev. Mr. Beck, a near relative of the present hereditary proprietor of the estate, kindly proposed taking Lieutenants Stribling and Magruder, and myself to it in his carriage, a few mornings since.

The road leads directly north from the town, and is a delightful turnpike having an open common—sprinkled here and there with a cluster of white cottages, a single hut, or a windmill—on either side. Seared, at this season of the year, by the winds of the autumn, its entire surface is sterile and dreary, like that of a heath in England. After three miles, however, the drive becomes beautiful, the road being completely embowered by groves of lofty oak and pine, and ornamented by handsome gateways, leading to mansions and cottages thickly scattered along the way—the summer retreats of “the powers that be,” and of those “rich in this world’s goods.” The turnpike winds gradually around the bases of the Table Mountain and Devil’s Peak, and at the end of six miles passes the small village of Wynberg. Two miles farther brought us to the end of our excursion. The approach to the gate is through a grove of the silver tree—protea argentea—affording us full proof of the appropriateness of their name. The long pointed leaves are thickly set on the branches, and being of a bluish green color, covered with a fine white furze or down, have the appearance, as the rays of the sun fall upon them, of being edged and tipped with silver.

Constantia was originally a Dutch government estate, and is beautifully located under the mountains of the range of Table Land, commanding fine views of the surrounding country, and of the Indian Ocean on the eastern side of the cape. It derives its name from the grape of Constantia in France, which was that introduced into its vineyards, and by which it has attained its celebrity. It was sold by the government to a gentleman of the name of Cletoè, an ancestor of the present occupant, and entailed in his family, subject to certain imposts on the proceeds of the vintage.

Since that period, the original estate has been divided into Upper, or Great, and Lower Constantia, from their relative position to the mountains. A new estate has also since been laid out, and planted on ground still more elevated; and, from that fact, called High Constantia. This we did not visit, but had a full view of its vineyards, stretching over the sides of a hill at the base of the mountains.

The entrance to Upper, or Great Constantia, is by an avenue of majestic oaks, a quarter of a mile or more in length, descending gradually to the house, a respectable looking old mansion in the Dutch style a century ago. Mr. Cloetè received us with much politeness, and after a conversation of half an hour in a drawing-room, conducted us through the gardens, shrubbery, and fruit yard in the rear of the mansion. The colony of the Cape of Good Hope may be correctly styled the land of fruit and flowers, and the grounds are filled with a handsome variety of both. The walks are lined with hedges of myrtle, and their intersections overspread with arbors beautifully arched and ornamented, by the training of the living oak. In speaking of the value of this noble tree, we were informed by the proprietor of its importance here in a respect which I do not recollect to have before seen noticed, in the sustenance it affords not only to swine, but to horses and cattle. The acorn is a principal food on the estate of these animals, furnished to them in the manner in which Indian corn is in the United States. After being gathered, they are preserved without difficulty, by keeping them covered with fresh water, in which manner they retain all their juices without being subject to decay.

A next visit was to the wine house, a long range of building filled with tiers of immense tanks of Constantia. From these a superintendant began at once to serve us with samples of the different kinds made on the estate. All the varieties—white and red, Frontinac, Muscadine, and Pontac, are sweet; too luscious to be drank except as a cordial, with cake, or after coffee at dinner.

We then passed through a vineyard of forty acres, inclining handsomely on one side of the house. The vines are kept very low, about three feet from the ground, without stake or trellis, and some of them were pointed out to us as more than seventy years old. The vintage of the season is just past and the grapes all gathered, but a cluster here and there, fully ripe, afforded a luxurious bonne bouche in our walk.

An elegant collation awaited our return to the mansion; after partaking of which we visited Lower Constantia, the possession of a Mr. Colyn. We were received in the same hospitable and kind manner by this gentleman, and conducted over an establishment equally rich and beautiful; and left, on our return to Wynberg—where we were to dine with the honorable Mr. Wheatley, a judge of the bench of Bengal—much gratified with the observations of the morning.

The next evening I was engaged to dine at the cottage of Governor Cole, ten miles in the country, with Captain Finch, Dr. Malone, and Captain Bance : and at half past six we took our seats in a landau and four, to meet the appointment. Just before night a southeast wind, the sirocco of the Cape, had suddenly risen, and was sweeping around and over every thing, almost with the power of a hurricane, driving and whirling the dust before it like the snow of a winter's storm in Otsego ; and, had not the accompanying temperature been sufficiently cool to admit of having the carriage closed, the ride would have been exceedingly unpleasant. With this advantage, however, and a knowledge of the excellence of the road—it being the same excepting two miles, that we had traveled to Constantia—we suffered no inconvenience, notwithstanding the darkness and the storm ; and, in little more than an hour, found ourselves whirling through the gates of Protea, the name given by Sir Lowry to the estate, from the abundance of the silver tree surrounding it.

The former country-seat of the governor of the colony, the Newlands, in the same vicinity, was a splendid establishment, costing the British government, it is said, during the administration of Lord Charles Somerset, the predecessor of General Cole, £80,000 sterling ; but this has been sold, and Protea is the private property of the governor ; upon which improvements are but just commencing, it having been in his possession only a short time. It seemed an unpretending establishment, for a captain general, though the opportunity of judging of its appearance was very imperfect, from the darkness of the night—the range of lights at the portico, with those of three or four chariots in waiting, throwing only a limited and flickering glare around.

We had been apprised that it was but a family party we were to join ; and on entering the drawing room found just the circle that those long cut off from the enjoyment of refined and polished society would wish to meet—divested of every thing like the formality and etiquette of an entertainment of state. Lady Frances, with two or three female companions, and four lovely daughters, from five to twelve years of age ; the governor and his aids, military and civil ; the attorney general and lady ; the surgeon of the household ; and one or two young officers in the uniform of the Scotch regiments, constituting the number. The general, in the full uniform of his rank, scarlet—with epaulets and cordons of gold—received us in the centre of the room, and after an interchange of salutations, presented each of our company in order to his lady, and then to the party in general.

Nothing in a family circle has a greater charm for me than a group of intelligent, well managed, and lovely children ; and the daughters of the household, in a uniform of scarlet crape, with blue ribbons on their necks to match their bright eyes, attracted my first attention. The younger two quickly threw off the reserve imposed by the entrance of strangers, and, while every look and every action told that they had been trained by no inferior hand, by their vivacity and playfulness presented a delightful picture of the happiness of childhood in the bosom of those it loves ; and it was with sincere regret that I perceived the whole number, when dinner was announced, kissing good night to Lady Frances, as she gave her hand to Captain Finch to be led to the salle à manger.

The entertainment in the dining room was all that elegance and taste could desire. On rejoining the ladies, however, at ten o'clock, for a cup of tea, I was gratified with a richer enjoyment—in addition to the conversation taking place—in the privilege of looking over the sketch book of Lady Cole, filled with drawings from nature, manifesting a high degree of native and cultivated talent in the art. The subjects, especially those in landscape, were of local interest to the family, in Ireland, France, and Spain, where Sir Lowry served in the peninsular war, in the Mauritius, where he was for several years governor, &c., &c., pointed out to me by Mr. Balfour, a nephew, and private secretary of the general, one of the most pleasing of the acquaintances I have formed during our voyage. Both Lady Frances and her sister Lady Catharine Bell, are distinguished for their high mental endowments, and for the various accomplishments of their education ; and I was happy to learn, that the influence of their rank and talents in the colony, is cast in favor of rational enjoyments and of piety. Lady Frances is not only the patroness, but a superintendent of the Sabbath School in the Episcopal Church.

The general and his family take possession of the government-house in town, in a few days, for the winter ; and on the 23d inst. a grand fête, in honor of the birthday of His Britannic Majesty, is to be given by them. Invitations were early issued to the officers of the Vincennes ; and both the governor and his lady expressed a cordial wish, before taking our leave, that we might remain to the entertainment.

LETTER III.

ARRIVAL AT ST. HELENA, AND INTERVIEW WITH GOVERNOR DALLAS.

U. S. Ship Vincennes, Bay of James Town, }
May, 3d 1830.

WE left our anchorage in Table Bay on the 19th ult., and on the morning of the 1st inst. descried St. Helena, at a distance of fifty miles—seeming only a small jagged-topped cloud of deep blue, on the verge of the horizon.

The night closed round us, while yet twenty-five or thirty miles distant. The evening was tranquil, and beautifully clear ; but strong and irresistible associations on the fate of the man, whose name and end have stamped eternal celebrity on the island before us, shrouded it in our eyes, with a gloom that rendered doubly sombre the deep neutral tint spread in an unvarying shade, over its precipitous coast. Every other emotion was lost in the feeling, that we were gazing on a mausoleum, in the midst of the mighty deep, appropriate in its features of dreariness and gloom to the later destinies of the genius whose remains repose within it. And with the pall and the bier, and all the saddening appendages of the grave floating in my imagination, I could compare the outline of the island, as seen against the sky in its bearings at the time, to nothing more descriptive of its general form, than a gigantic coffin—to which, in reality, the perpendicular headlands on either end, the proportionate length and heighth, and an unvaried sable hue, gave it no slight resemblance.

The light of the following morning, converted the blackness of the bare walls of rock bounding the whole island, as seen in the preceding evening, into a reddish brown, but without diminishing the general aspect of dreariness and desolation. Nothing like freshness or verdure was to be seen, except a few pointed hills, rising in the centre, above the general mass of sterility, and belted beneath by a narrow strip of cultivated country, sprinkled with a cottage and plantation here and there—beautiful indeed, but only like the oasis of the desert, from a strength of contrast with every thing around.

Every headland and craggy peak is surmounted by its flag staff and signal station, from one to another of which, communications were constantly making, as we approached. In doubling the north end, we neared the shore so closely, that the monstrous cliffs composing it—becoming more and more lofty and precipitous in the vicinity of James Town, on the northwest—towered hundreds of feet perpendicularly above our mastheads. The first view of Buttermilk Point, on passing which the anchorage comes in sight, is singularly striking, from the batteries planted high on its very face, and occupying every nook and crevice in which a gun can be secured—presenting in one spot a projecting rock, and in another a wide mouthed port, with a heavy piece of artillery pointed towards you, here a short stretch of artificial wall, and there a breast-work of the original cliff—without any plan or order, other than that of the natural formation. The mouths of cannon project at irregular intervals and distances, from the top to the bottom, among which, the heads of a half dozen guards were seen peering over the parapets upon us, like eagles from the midst of their aeries.

This aspect is, in a greater or less degree, characteristic of the cliffs the remaining distance of a mile to James Town; in front of which, we were soon moored within a quarter of a mile of the shore. The glen, in the narrow mouth of which it stands, is wedged in between two almost perpendicular walls of brown lava near a thousand feet in height, approaching each other as they run inland, till at the distance of a couple of miles, they shut out all farther view. An esplanade in front, of a few hundred yards extent—formed by a massive wall ten or twelve feet high, running across the glen to guard the beach from the encroachment of a heavy surf—is planted with a battery, and ornamented with a double row of trees of the banian tribe, skirting the walls of the town. The first buildings above the tops of these, that catch the eye, are a neat church of light yellow, with a square tower on the right side of the gate in the centre of the wall, and the government-house, or castle, a large heavy looking mansion surrounded by trees and gardens, on the other. Between these, from the rapid ascent of the ground, a full view is presented of an open, unplanted square, surrounded by residences of good size and comfortable appearance, beyond which the roofs of numerous habitations interspersed with a few trees, a lofty building or two—a barrack and hospitals are seen—stretching up the narrow defile for a mile or more, till they terminate in a view of some neat cottages and gardens overlooking the whole, at the extreme point in sight.

This morning at eleven o'clock, Captain Finch, accompanied by Dr. Malone and myself, went on shore to wait upon the governor, the Honorable Brigadier General Dallas—as many others of the officers as could be spared from the ship, having already started for Longwood.

The only landing is close beneath a projection of the cliff, on the left of the anchorage, under the bastions of a fort planted on the face of the rock, some eighty or a hundred feet above the water. Though more sheltered from the swell of the sea than any other spot, still caution is requisite in getting from a boat on the abutment and steps of massive stone with which it is furnished; as the water is of great depth, and its rise and fall in the eddy and whirl of the surf at all times several feet, and often so great as altogether to interrupt the communication between the shipping and town. A causeway, hewn from the rock, leads along the base of the hill—from the perpendicular surface of which on the one hand, enormous masses projecting in frowning deformity, threaten momentarily to crush you beneath their tremendous weight, while on the other, are the roar, and lashing against the parapet, of a deadly surf. An irresistible query, as we trod this fearful way, was—what must have been the thoughts and the feelings of the imperial captive, when, for the first and the last time, he paced this same ground, and gazed above and around him, on the horrid features of his appointed prison? For the moment, at least, I suspect the firmness of the philosopher must have been shaken, and the nerve of the hero unmanned.

On passing the gate, an air of comfort, of quietness, and of leisure, is visible in every thing: there is nothing of the stir and bustle of business, but, on every side, evidence of indolence and inactivity—soldiers in handsome uniform lounging around—officers in rich undress—and clusters of gentlemen in citizen's garb, seated in the shade beside the houses, or in verandas in front.

Mr. Solomon, a merchant of wealth, kindly threw open his house to the officers of the ship, immediately on our arrival; and we availed ourselves of his hospitality till the governor should arrive from Plantation House, the governmental country seat, three miles inland, where his family exclusively reside. He visits the castle in town, however, almost daily on business; and when informed of his presence there, under the guidance of Mr. Solomon, we paid our respects to him.

Our reception by the General and his son, a Captain in the Hon. East India Company's service, and by Captain Knipe, civil aid, or secretary, was most cordial ; and immediately followed by an invitation to dine with himself and family this evening at six o'clock ; but being already engaged to Mr. Solomon, the invitation was renewed for to-morrow, after we should have accomplished a visit to Longwood. Knowing that the Council of the Island was convening, and the Governor consequently occupied, after a short and agreeable interview, we took leave for a more extensive survey of the town previous to the dinner hour of Mr. Solomon.

LETTER IV.

THE TOMB OF NAPOLEON, LONGWOOD, AND PLANTATION HOUSE.

U. S. ship Vincennes, Bay of Jamestown, }
 May 5th, 1830.

YESTERDAY morning Captain Finch, Dr. Malone, and myself took breakfast with Dr. Price, the health officer of the port, and soon afterwards became mounted for an excursion to Longwood, and the residence of General Dallas.

After the ride of an hour, up the zig-zag roads cut in the surface of the hill—by which alone, on the one side of the glen or the other, the ascent to the mountainous country in the central parts of the island can be made—we found ourselves beyond the highest point of land between Jamestown and Longwood, on the edge of a tremendous gulf of an oval form, called the "Devil's Punch Bowl." The precipices surrounding it are deeply furrowed by the washing of heavy rains, and are every where tinged with hues of the most delicate shade—a light purple dashed with pink and pale yellow predominating—the whole caused by the colored earth, of which the soil is here constituted. At the head of this chasm, a narrow and secluded glen—contrasting strongly, in the verdure and freshness of its trees, shrubbery, and grassy sides with the coloring and nakedness of the wider and deeper parts below—lies cradled in green hills; and is the nook in which repose the bones of the greatest man of his age, and one of the master-spirits of his race—

 Far—far below, by storms is curl'd ;
 As round him heav'd, while high he stood,
 A stormy and unstable world.
 Alone he sleeps ! the mountain cloud
 That night hangs round him, and the breath
 Of morning scatters, is the shroud
 That wraps the Conqueror's clay in death.
 Hark !—comes there from the Pyramids,
 And from Siberian wastes of snow,
 And Europe's hills, a voice that bids
 The world he aw'd, to mourn him ?—No !
 His only—his perpetual dirge
 Is the wild sea bird's piercing cry—
 The mournful murmur of the surge—

The tufted tops of the willows that droop around his grave, and the cottage and garden of the keeper are seen in the depths of the glen, while, on the height of the banks above, appears the white front of Huts' gate, the farm house occupied by Moutholon, and from which the captive was accustomed to descend on foot to the spring, near which he chose for himself a resting place. Directly across the gulf, and within a mile in direct line, lies the plantation of Longwood spread over an extensive plain, with the old and new houses on the gentle swelling of the highest point, with a few trees clustering around them.

The road to the plantation leads around the chasm by Huts' Gate, and the ride to it is at least two miles from the point of this first distant view.

A few moments' ride brought us to a gate on the principal road, opening into that, cut in the side of the hill, for the funeral procession. This we descended; and, on reaching a second gate at the end of half a mile, committed our horses to a person in waiting, and, passing round a bank tufted with shrubbery, and gay with the scarlet blossoms of a geranium, found ourselves at the tomb of NAPOLEON, and on the brink of the pure fountain, the sweetness and refreshing coolness of whose waters in such a climate, led to the eventual consecration of the spot.

The grave is surrounded by a double inclosure; the first of wooden pales in a dark paint, is a widely sweeping circle inclosing the four willows overhanging it, and the other a square of about twelve feet of plain iron railing—marking the immediate dimensions of the tomb itself. This consists of three large flag stones of granite—taken for the purpose from the hearth of the kitchen in New Longwood—laid, without any inscription, in substantial masonry at an elevation of a few inches only above the ground : a monument rude and unadorned, and in good keeping with the end of the ill-fated exile on whose bosom it presses.

After examining every point of interest—drinking of the water of the spring, securing slips from the willows, inscribing our names in an album in care of the keeper, and musing on the career and fate of the conqueror over the little space of earth that alone of all his kingdoms is retained in his possession, we remounted our horses ; and returning to the public road, proceeded round the head of the ravine by Hut's Gate to Longwood.

The lodges and gate are a quarter of a mile or more from the house. The drive from them is straight and unornamented, except by a few straggling gum trees, and for the last few rods ascends gradually to the site of the buildings. The horse I rode, had been at no very remote period a famous racer. At different times during the ride from James Town, he had manifested some desire to give a specimen of his fleetness, and the moment of passing the gate, probably from the frequency of his visits and familiarity with the ground, started at full speed with me ; and had my accoutrements been at all similar, I should have arrived at Longwood much in the plight in which Gilpin found himself on the anniversary of his wedding on alighting at Ware. The only result in this case, however, was a separation for the time, from my companions—by which I had an opportunity of looking round me for a few moments while they were coming up, after having committed my horse to the care of one of three or four urchins, ever ready on the ground for such employment, in the daily visits which the plantation now receives from strangers calling at the island.

The general aspect of the establishment is that of an ordinary, shabby farm-house of stone, meanly stuccoed and irregularly built—the whole being in bad repair. Long ranges of sheds for cattle, painted of a dismal color, line two sides of a large square cow-yard in which it is situated, while a third is formed by the kitchens, and offices of the principal house. The approach through this dirty inclosure, as a lawn, did not promise much for the interior; but I must confess, that when—on being ushered from it through a door opening on the ground, with the announcement “this was the bed-room and dressing-room of the emperor”—I found myself in a small, dark, and filthy stable, occupied by half a dozen horses, swarming with flies, and teeming with impurity, I could scarce suppress a flush of indignant feeling, at the contempt and degradation which appeared thus, unnecessarily, to be cast upon the illustrious, though, perhaps, justly unfortunate and unhappy, dead.

I never was a warm admirer of the character of Bonaparte—while yet in my early infancy, he had exchanged the greenness of his consular laurels for the glitter of the diadem; and in the days of my boyish politics, when his sceptre was extending widely over Europe, I regarded him principally as the proud usurper, whose ambition it was to triumph over the kingdoms of the earth, till he should become the Dictator of the world. But, who has not admired the power of genius that raised him to his glory? Who did not feel some sympathy, at least, in the depth of his fall? Who did not commiserate him in the distance and desolateness of his exile? And who, with the vivid impressions of the wretchedness and discomfort of his captivity, forced upon them by the scene in the midst of which we now were, would not be disposed to believe every charge of unkindness and oppression that has been preferred against his keepers? However different the state of the establishment might have been when inhabited by Napoleon, all the associations of a visitor, with his situation during the time, take their color from what is seen; and the rooms should have been preserved in the condition in which they were left, or the whole should have been razed to the ground.

The next apartment we entered, is that in which he died. It had been used as a writing room and library; and he was removed to it, after becoming seriously ill, for the benefit of a more free circulation of air. It is small, with two windows on one side, between which the bed, on which he expired, was placed. A threshing machine, festooned with cobwebs, is now its only furniture; and not only the paper in which it was once hung, but the plaster, and even parts of the wall itself, have been carried away by the numerous visitors since his death.

On one side of this is the dining room—a low, dark, and uncomfortable corner of the building—and in front of it, the new wooden part put up after his arrival at St. Helena, consisting of two rooms connected by folding doors, one for billiards, and the other dignified by the name of a drawing-room, but neither equal in size or style to a parlor in most common farm houses in the United States.

The review of the whole, in their present condition, tends, irresistibly, to produce feelings of sadness, and such was the prevalence of these in my own bosom, that on stepping into the open air in front, every thing in sight seemed gloomy and desolate; and I could readily conceive, that even a great mind, suddenly cut off, not only from the splendor of an imperial station in one of the most refined nations of the world, but from all the enjoyments of private and domestic life, might speedily sink under the oppressive influence of the unvarying sameness and desolation of such a prison.

The plantation of Longwood is the property of the East India Company; and the management of it, at present, under a superintendent of the name of Brokie. Himself and family occupy the house built for Count Bertrand, a few hundred yards distant, on a line with New Longwood House, the edifice erected for Napoleon, but to which he refused to remove. Mr. Brokie having heard of our arrival, came up, and went through the rooms again with us; showed us a decayed shrubbery which had been planted under the direction of Bonaparte—a small fish pond—a young oak of his own planting, &c. &c., all in the dimensions and style of those of a child's play-house in the precincts of a nursery. We then accompanied him to his residence, a pretty cottage-like house, surrounded by trees and shrubbery. During the life of Napoleon, there was a covered walk between it and Longwood—enabling him to visit his friends unseen by others. We were here served, by Mr. Brokie, with fruit and other refreshments, in a neat saloon commanding views of the most highly cultivated parts of the plantation, of the rising ground near a mile distant at Deadwood, where the troops were encamped, and of the ocean. In the Venetian shutters, holes were shown us, cut by Napoleon himself, for a spyglass, by which, without exposing himself to view, he could observe the evolutions of the troops, and the movements in camp.

The next object of curiosity was the New House, as it is called—a spacious, well planned, and handsomely finished mansion, calculated in all respects to secure the comfort of him for whom it was designed. It is a quadrangle of stone, stuccoed and painted yellow, with a roof of slate. The suite of rooms for Bonaparte himself—consisting of a dining, a drawing, and a billiard room, of a breakfast parlor, library, bed-chamber, dressing apartments, and bath—is noble and airy : as also are the parts intended for Count Moutholon and family. The whole stands unoccupied and unfurnished ; and the government of the island are utterly at a loss to what purpose it can be best appropriated.

Having thus completed our visit, after thanking Mr. Brokie for his politeness, we remounted ; and with a boy for our guide, set off for Plantation House, several miles distant on the opposite side of the island.

The central parts of St. Helena are as singularly romantic and beautiful by nature, and as highly enriched by cultivation and art, as the exterior is forbidding and desolate ; and after repassing Hut's Gate, our ride of two and a half hours, through the bosom of a lovely little vale, adorned by several handsome mansions and neat cottages, and by a zig-zag road cut in the sides of a succession of verdant hills till we reached Diana's Peak, the highest point of the island, and then descended again to the residence of General Dallas, was interesting and delightful, beyond any anticipation we could have indulged, from every thing previously seen. Diana's Peak can be ascended on horseback till within a few rods of its summit. This consists of a platform of rock, mantled with vines and shrubbery, and overhung by a few low trees, from which the whole island is seen in birdseye view with the ocean on every side—its farthest verge, at a distance of fifty or sixty miles, being scarce distinguishable from the sky.

The scene, as looked down upon from this point, is one of the most unique, diversified, and beautiful, that can be imagined ; wanting only an icy pinnacle and snow-capped summit, here and there, to make it a perfect Switzerland in miniature : and could a first sight of St. Helena be taken from Diana's Peak, or any of the surrounding points of view, it would be thought that the imperial exile had been the inhabitant of a paradise, rather than a prisoner on a desolate and barren rock. So strictly true is this, of the romance and improvements of the interior, that the seat of Sir William Doveton, just beneath, on the road to the governmental county house, is by no means inappropriately called FAIRY LAND.

It was near four o'clock when we entered the grounds of Plantation-house, the Eden of the island; embracing within its inclosures the growth and the beauty, in fruit and flower, of every region, and where every impression is at once lost, but that of being in the rich enjoyment of all in nature and art, that refinement, taste, and elegance, need desire. The house fronts an extensive circular lawn, descending gradually for a half mile or more towards the sea, and terminating in an open terrace, beyond and beneath which the ocean only is to be seen—while on either side it is flanked by luxuriant groves of every growth, sweeping widely down a gentle declivity, embowering a carriage drive of several miles extent, and screening entirely from view, without obstructing a sight of the ocean, all the nakedness and deformity of the coast two or three miles distant. The mansion itself is a spacious and substantial edifice, stuccoed and painted in imitation of stone; reminding me, in its general aspect, of the seat of the honorable E. P. Livingston, at Clermont, on the Hudson.

We were received into a fine hall, furnished with a billiard table, by an aid-de-camp of the general; and, having sent a change of clothes from the town, by a servant in the morning, were shown at once to rooms to dress for dinner, the first bell being just ringing. On re-entering the vestibule, we found the governor, Captain Dallas, his son, and an aid, in readiness to conduct us to the drawing room ; where, on being presented to Mrs. Dallas and three daughters, to Miss Young, an intimate friend of the young ladies, to the honorable Mr. Brooke, senior member of the council of St. Helena, the Rev. Mr. Vernon, colonial chaplain, and to the gentlemen of the governor's family, we met one of those circles of refinement, elegance, and accomplishments, which, after the intercourse even of an hour, are parted from with sincere regret.

We had been invited, with the greatest kindness and cordiality, to remain over the night ; and were not expected by the family to return to the ship till the following day. It was therefore with no little chagrin, at nine o'clock, after a cup of tea, in an elegantly furnished library, from which the attractive display of an adjoining music room was seen, that I perceived Captain Finch making a bow, pour prendre congé, to Mrs. Dallas, just as I had entered into a conversation of much interest, with one of the most accomplished of the circle.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE Vincennes sailed from St. Helena on the evening of the fifth of May, the date of the preceding letter; and, after a prosperous voyage of thirty-two days, made the Jersey shore, some thirty miles south of Sandy Hook, on the afternoon of the seventh of June. We were obliged to lie to, during the night; but early next morning, received a pilot on board, and entered the lower bay. The wind did not allow the ship to come immediately to the city; but a fine breeze springing up at midday, by four o'clock we were at the quarantine, and no cause of detention existing, soon after filled our topsails to drop anchor, within the hour, at the close of a prosperous voyage of the world.

Those only who, after an absence of nearly four years—the case with most of the ship's company—from all they hold most dear; who have sailed from clime to clime, visiting three of the four quarters of the world, holding intercourse with almost every variety of its inhabitants, and finding rushed over the beautiful bay towards the queen of the western world, resting brightly on her waters, in the evening lustre of a summer's sun. The green hills already behind us—the emerald islets studding the bosom of the harbor—the richly cultivated heights of Long Island and the Jersey shore, with the Hudson and her basaltic cliffs in the blue distance, never before looked half so lovely. And when—as we rapidly approached our destination, with the light sail of the news collector and fisherman, clustering round, and two noble steamboats, crowded with our fellow-citizens, if not with personal friends, who appeared from their looks to be participating with us in the exultation and thankfulness of our joy, passing by—the band, in appropriate and heart-felt strains, saluted our country and our home, with “Hail Columbia! happy land!” the power of association overcame the manliness of every other feeling, and I doubt whether, from the quarterdeck to the forecastle, a tearless eye was to be seen.

An anchor had scarcely been dropped, before Captain Finch, with his accustomed kindness, ordered his gig to be lowered to carry me to the city. Like my companions, I had been without tidings from any of my friends, for more than a twelvemonth; and I shall be pardoned, at least by some of my readers, for adding one word upon the dispensations that awaited my landing.

The intelligence of the first few minutes confirmed the forebodings of ill, which had sometimes, while at sea, given a cast of melancholy to a meditative hour. The object of attachment, to whom all I had written during my absence had been addressed, was then lying in the interior of the state, at the point of death; and it was doubtful whether, even by traveling express, I should have the privilege of meeting her alive. This, in mercy, was granted me; and a hope, for a time, was afterwards indulged, that she might still be rescued from the grave, and restored to health, to her family, and to society—but it proved illusive; and, on the 6th of September following, she died "the death of the righteous," and entered upon that "REST THAT REMAINETH FOR THE PEOPLE OF GOD."

MANUSCRIPT LEFT AT NUKUHIVA BY CAPTAIN FINCH.

THE United States' ship Vincennes, having visited the ports of Taiohae and Oomi,* both in the island of Nukuhiva—having spent fifteen days thereat, and now being about to depart—I take occasion to state, for the information of subsequent visitors, that on my arrival I was strongly importuned for muskets, powder, flints, and other warlike weapons and munitions; but that I abstained from giving any thing of the kind, as I soon discovered that a war was raging among the different clans.

I have found the chiefs and natives obliging to us, but a little troublesome, from the number that desired to come on board; and in this respect both our patience and forbearance have been tested. All persons, however, were excluded at night.

I have seen the principal chiefs of four settlements; have had conferences with them; recommended peace to them; pointed out their individual, general, and local interests; charged them to be correct and honest in their deportment towards all foreigners, particularly trading vessels which may visit them;

We have wooded and watered here, as has also a French merchant ship, called the Duchess of Berri, the master of which vessel adopted the same regulations, and followed the same course of treatment towards the chiefs and all other natives, that I pursued. He arrived a day or two after us, and sailed again some days ago.

In return for wood, water, hogs, cocoa-nuts, bread, fruit, &c., we have given cotton cloths, both plain and colored, axes, knives, chissels, files, and other useful tools; also combs, tobacco, and old clothes.

I am aware of only a few instances of dishonesty or theft, and these occurred principally among the Taipiis.

Although our reception and treatment have been apparently most cordial, yet I recommend vigilance and circumspection, and not too ready a confidence in the natives.*

A very decent, well behaved man, called William Morrison, who is thoroughly acquainted with the language of the Island, has been of very essential service in my intercourse. He is here collecting sandal wood.

Haapè is the principal proprietor and chief of the bay of Taiohae: he is also regent, and the guardian of the orphan boy Moana, who is by inheritance the rightful king or high chief of the whole island; and will be so acknowledged, I presume, when he attains manhood. W. C. B. FINCH.

* As a precautionary measure of security I required the presence of a high chief on board ship while free intercourse was taking place with the shore.

SUMMARY OF THE CRUISE.

BY CAPTAIN FINCH.

IN the fulfillment of my orders, I pursued the route most familiar to commerce since the days of the earliest navigators: of course, nothing original has been elicited by it, in a geographical point. I was not on a voyage of discovery; my instructions were specific; and the unlooked-for extension of an already long cruise, forbade delays at any place where I might touch, or any deviation, in attaining the respective goals appointed, at the quickest period—both in regard to the apposite season for the respective passages, and good faith and observance of the renewed terms of engagement with the ship's company. Yet professionally, the result is, a confirmation in part of the remarks and information communicated by Captain Jones, of the Peacock, in so much that our tracks were similar; and the independent ascertainment (almost to a certainty) of the non-existence of Caroline Island,* (northward of the society cluster,) in the situation assigned to it upon Arrowsmith's chart of 1798; and of two other nameless ones, in east longi-

* It is not meant to be implied, that there is no such island as the Caroline. I believe that the United States' schooner Dolphin touched at it. The conclusion only is, that it is laid down erroneously on the charts.

tude, (supposed recent discoveries,) immediately to the westward of the Sandwich group, which are important facts. Had they existed, as described, the Vincennes must have met them, for she literally passed over the space, which is allotted to their occupancy. So further onward, in the Indian Ocean, she ran for, and passed within a short distance of a supposed shoal, mentioned as having been seen from the ship Suffolk, in 1827.

These islands and shoals, (it is to be remarked,) are stated as being in the way in which a vessel has unavoidably to go, in performing the circuit which the Vincennes has accomplished; and alone furnish, (separate from other considerations,) an almost sufficient inducement for our government to fit out an expedition for the exclusive determination of doubtful islands, in the routs pursued by our numerous and enterprising merchants and traders. If islands exist, there may be also reefs, shoals, and breakers. The removal of uncertainty on these heads, would relieve navigators from some solicitude—which under the most favoring circumstances, is already sufficiently great; and would also facilitate the voyages in which they might be engaged. The presumed existence of a spot of land in one's rout, produces a perplexing circumspection, which often causes a deviation from a direct path, reduction of canvas, rate of sailing, loss of favorable winds, exhaustion of supplies, discontent, and probable disappointment in a market, &c.

The Vincennes' voyage will serve to correct a very general and common error—that it is an easy one to a vessel, and of a duration to be computed with precision. Neither is the fact. None is more trying to a ship's hull, qualities, rigging, and spars; and only such vessel, as is most perfect, ought to undertake it. The winds are not to be relied upon, with any confidence, either as to the actual points whence they may blow; when or where to be met with; or as to their strength and continuance. In this opinion my Diary bears me out fully. We may have been unfortunate in the season, (however old sailors at Oahu said it was the best;) for truly I never saw rougher seas or stronger blows any where, than we frequently met to the westward of the Ladrone Islands, in the northern part of the Chinese Sea, to the westward of Java-Head, and near the banks of Agulhas. If the weather had been of freezing temperature, the ship could scarcely have been taken care of or managed.

The opportunity which has been enjoyed by the officers, of personal acquaintance with places, inspection of coasts and ports, and the knowledge acquired as to the stores, supplies, and refreshments to be obtained, are considerations of weight; and in the event of war, or other enterprises, may avail the nation greatly. Another result is, the demonstration of the practicability of preserving, for a very long period of confinement at sea, a crowded crew, in an accustomed state of health.

If another vessel should return home from the western coast of America, by the way of the Islands in the Pacific* ocean—(a frigate ought not to be ordered; because the islands, except Oahu, do not afford proper harbors and shelter; and there the water is too shoal for a frigate)—it will be useful to allow her more time, and to start sooner, say in April, than the Vincennes. It might prove beneficial also to give her a latitude for observation, so as to pass over those routs of trade which are adopted, when the regular season by the established channels has been forfeited—I mean what is termed the eastern passage to and from China and India, and the various straits conducting to these countries. For this purpose, however, a ship ought to be more especially found and furnished in all particulars, than the Vincennes was; which vessel was adapted for the purposes of a stationary cruiser only—that is, her operations were originally expected to be confined to a limited extent, of a well known coast. That the Vincennes has seen nothing remarkable, is to be attributed to the fact, that there now remains in her rout nothing wonderful to be seen; but the field is yet open for the confirmation or refutation of what has already been declared to have been seen or met with. The good effects of the tour, in other respects, can be best deduced, (and will at once exhibit themselves,) from the various reports which I have made, and the communications of other persons which accompany my statements and remarks.

Respectfully submitted.

W. C. B. FINCH,

At sea, May 20th, 1830.

The Hon. the Secretary of the Navy.
